

THE BACKWOODS' BRIDE.

BEADLE AND COMPANY.

NEW YORK: 118 WILLIAM ST. LONDON: 44 PATERNOSTER ROW.

American News Company, 121 Nassau St.

THE PRISONER OF LA VINTRESSE!

BY MRS. MARY A. DENISON, Author of "Chip."

BEADLE AND COMPANY Publishers 141 William St. N.Y.

The midnight flight and pursuit .- page 90.

THE BACKWOODS BRIDE.

A

ROMANCE OF SQUATTER LIFE.

BY MRS. METTA V. VICTOR.

IRWIN P. BEADLE AND COMPANY.

141 WILLIAM St., CORNER OF FULTON.

Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1860, by IRWIN P. BEADLE & CO., in the Clerk's Office of the District Court of the United States for the Southern District of New York.

THE BACKWOODS BRIDE.

A

ROMANCE OF SQUATTER LIFE.

CHAPTER I.

THE CAMP-MEETING.

Mr. Gardiner reined in his horse to take a survey of the novel scene before him. He had been leisurely riding along, thinking of the errand on which he was bent, which was, to see some squatters who had erected their cabins upon land already purchased from Government, by his agent, the previous year,—when he had suddenly come into full view of a camp-meeting, the noise of which had attracted him some moments before he ascertained its cause.

The camping-ground had been selected on the borders of one of those fairy lakes, which gleam like enchanted mirrors out of their emerald frames, and are set in the most unexpected places, every here and there, through certain portions of Michigan. Curious and unaccountable these lakes are, for, though many are small enough to throw a stone across, and one of them is named Dollar Lake, so small and round and bright is it, they are cold and fathomless.

Close down to the narrow strip of silver sand, which circled the dimpled sheet of water, grew beautiful groves, whose trees, though tall and promising, had nothing of the ancient solemnity of some of our primeval forests,—for these were of youthful growth, and had sprung up within twenty years on grounds which had erst been desolated by annual fires. In the mingled shadow and sunshine of this lovely spot, were gathered together two or three hundred people. Rude sexts of boards, supported on the stumps of saplings which had been sawn off some sixteen or eighteen inches from the ground, surrounded the speaker's stand, which was canopied by the noble branches of one of the largest oaks.

Upon these seats many of the congregation were now sitting; but as many others were scattered about in the doors of their tents, and in their wagons, while some of the more youthful and reckless of the crowd were perched in the trees, where they could "see the fun," disturb with sly pranks the more serious-minded, and send down grimaces to their fellow sinners. The wagons were drawn up in a semicircle, at a little distance, many of them covered, and answering the purpose of tents; while within this circle, another, formed of tents of all shapes and patterns, the most of them made of poles, covered over thickly with the green branches of the forest, after the manner of Indian wigwams; others of blankets, blue, red, and striped, and still others of snowy white cloth, most likely some of the good housewives homespun sheets.

At the moment of Harry Gardiner's reaching the camp, one of the preachers was offering up a prayer. With the natural reverence of a noble nature, Harry took off his cap, and remained respectfully listening. The preacher was a broadchested, black-haired, brown-faced man, who looked fitted in stature and muscle to hold earthly, as well as spiritual warfare. When he first began his prayer, his voice was a clear whisper, which blended in with the rustling of the leaves and the murmur of the lake, as if nature and man were praying together, and with an inconceivable sweet and thrilling effect. So soul-subduing it was, that even the human monkeys and squirrels in the tree-tops ceased their pranks, and the rough men who were whistling and defying the effects of the preaching, began to open their mouths and put their hands in their pockets, in an attitude of attention.

Harry saw four villainous-looking fellows, who were playing cards inside a covered wagon, forget their game, and bend to listen, as the whisper rose, as the whisper of a storm rises in the forest, until that strange, deep, powerful voice swayed its hearers to and fro; sighed, and shrieked, and thundered in a mighty tempest of supplication, which shook the people as reeds are shaken in a fearful wind. Then that excitable gathering, made up mostly of those unused to controlling their emotions, and whose feelings had already been powerfully wrought upon, began to weep and wail, blending their lamentation with the voice which almost fiercely implored their salvation. The deep "amen" of the deacons, the sobbing of the women, the groans of the men, were borne aloft by that tempest of entreaty, until Harry, young and enthusiastic as was his temperament, almost looked for a miracle in the shape of a special answer from the depths of the calm, blue sky above them. Hardly would he have wondered, had those blue, ethereal curtains parted, and through a flood of golden light, the Dove had descended, whispering, "Peace, be still!" to the tumultuous multitude.

At last the prayer was ended. Strong as appeared his bodily powers, the speaker seemed exhausted, mentally and physically, as he sank upon his seat, and wiped the swarthy brow, now almost pale with emotion. He had "wrestled with God" for these people whom he loved; and not only with God, but with the devil, whom, he was bound, should not have a single one of these congregated souls. In the comparative silence which followed his sitting down, the sobs and screams of women, who were rocking themselves to and fro, or who had flung themselves prone upon the ground, as well as the shouts and groans of the men, became more audible. Harry dismounted, and tying his horse to a tree, went forward near the benchese The thought had struck him that the men he wished to see were doubtless, many of them, at this meeting; and during the noon recess, which was now approaching, he would have an opportunity of speaking with them.

"For shame, Susan Carter, to set here without shedding a tear, and listen to such preachin' and prayin' as we've heard this mornin'. Your heart must be as hard as the nether mill-stone. There's Polly Hubbard faintin' away, now, in her mother's arms,—and she was always a better girl than you,—hadn't nigh so much need of repentance."

"Indeed, Aunt Debby, I joined in the prayer with all my soul; but I shouldn't like to make such a public exhibition of my feelings as that."

Harry Gardiner looked at the speakers, who occupied a seat close beside him, as he stood in the outer edge of the circle. One of them was a spinster of about five-and-forty, with a narrow and peaked face, down either side of which, a few wiry ringlets of black hair, were permitted to fall. She wore one of the immense bonnets of that period, a fine leghorn, which cost fifteen dollars, and was to last fifteen years. Her green dress and white vandyke, looked prim and neat. Beside her sat a girl of seventeen or eighteen, so fresh, and fair, and pretty, by contrast, as a young violet to a frostbitten marigold. It was a warm summer day, and her straw bonnet was lying in her lap. The flickering shadows of the maple-trees above them, played over her brown tresses, and smooth, white forehead, and made flitting patterns over her simple white frock. Just at this moment, when Harry first observed her, the flush in her cheek, and the tears which trembled like two great diamonds on her drooped eyelashes, made her especially lovely. The rebuke of her self-righteous relative had made the flood to brim over, which the words of the preacher had already caused to rise.

"Shouldn't like to 'umble yourself, you mean," continued the aunt, tartly. "A girl that can lead off the dance as spry as you, needn't talk about being afraid to make a show of herself. If you'd dance less, and pray more, you'd be nigher your duty than you are now. If you'd a right sense of your own want of grace, you'd just go down on your face before the hull congregation."

"Maybe I shall gain grace, by and by, if I strive for it," was the quiet reply.

"How long do you 'spose you'll be safe in putting it off? You're well and hearty, and full of life and spirits to-day; but to-morrow you may be sick or dead, Susan Carter."

The young man shuddered slightly as this appalling thought was awakened by that loud, unrelenting tone.

"See! there's more'n a dozen goin' down to the lake to be baptized. They're making sure of their salvation, even before they get their dinners. See how happy they are,—shouting 'glory!' and clapping their hands. Is there any sinful, earthly pleasure that is equal to their joy?—answer me that? Come! shall I tell one of the ministers you'd like to be baptized?"

"Not to-day, Aunt Debby. Indeed, I must have time to think. - It's too important an act to decide upon so hastily."

"Well, I've done my duty in askin' you. You were always an obstinate, self-willed girl. There comes your father. I reckon he's thinkin' of dinner; but there's the folks to be baptized."

A pleasant-looking, hard-han led, sunburnt farmer, now approached.

Herry was quite certain that this was one of the men he wished to see, for the name—Carter—was that of one of the intruders upon his domains. He resolved upon accosting him; but the whole meeting was at present absorbed in the ceremony of baptism, which was going on. One purty stood up on their bench to overlook the scene. When the sweet hymn swelled up, at the close of the sacred rites, Harry was touched alike by the fervent enthusiasm of the people, and the beauty of the place and scene. The limpid clearness of the lake, where it stretched out over a lead of silver sand, before a ming to the "jumping-off" place into immensurable depths, fitted it peculiarly for the office it served. The trees stood around the shore like solemn witnesses.

As the grand old hymn reverberated through the forest, Harry stole a glance at the sweet countenance of Susan, which was all trembling and alight with pure worship and gladness. The slight stain of tears upon her cheeks softened her somewhat brilliant beauty. Rustic as was her white frock, her blue scurf, and kid slippers, she looked so invocent, so mailenly, so refined, that she gave an impression of all womanly sweetness and excellence.

"I shall be sorry if I've got to put les father to trouble," mused Harry.

When the singing case I, and the crowd begin to statter among the tents and wagons, he introduced hims if to Mr. Carter, stating that he had chanced upon the camp, while trying to find his way to his house. Without stopping to inquire the nature of his business, the squatter give him a walcome, inviting him to dine with him in his tent. Harry tell relation to eat the solt of a man whose interests he was alout to interfer with; but conclous of intending to a twith the strictest justice, he concluded to a copt that he pitality. It was a pretty sight to him, to sit in the deep of the tent, and see Sign fall the lettle from a pail of water which he falls re-brought from the lake, and hang it on the crane made by laying a pole across a couple of crotches. With more teste than was displayed by many of their neighbors, she spread a white table-cloth on the grass beside the tent, arranging upon it the cold ham and bread, pickles, and pies, which formed their homely luncheon. When the water boiled, she set the coffee to steeping, and its savory odor, and the funciful blaze and sparkle of the stick fire, were very pleasant.

All these things Harry noted and enjoyed silently, while he was talking sociably with his host. He was not so fastiliers but that he relihsed the coffee served up in tin cups, and the bread and meat which each one cut for hims if, when they were finally summoned to the table, and waited upon by the half-shy, half-mirthful, Susan.

The elder woman, who had been addressed as Aunt D. By by her companion, had been holding a mournful conversation with a young minister upon the subject of the vanity and frivolity of so many extremely young girls, say, those who were younger than herself; and how foolish and in the rest, to say nothing of sinful, it would be for a young man, called to serve the Lord, to set his affections upon any of these indy high-flyers, when the summons to luncheon caused her to join the family party. When she found herself seated upon the grass opposite a young man, good-boking, well-trees heard of the most agreeable manners, the sad severity of her count nance melted away like frost beneath the glands of the sand give a twist to her raven ringlets.

"Comin' among us to settle, sir?" she in prired, in a pringent voice, which was to the our as sweetened vin gar is to the taste.

"I have hardly decided," answered the young struct. "I have purchased a large amount of land, and other properly in this section of your State; and if I like the country, I may think it best to stop and look after my possessions myself."

"I must fain hope you'll find it to your interest to do so, sir. We young people feel the need of congenial so ity very much. It's true there's a good many youth of the opposite sex—more than there are of my own, at present,—lent they are sourcely such as we would wish to encourage—that is,

Susan and myself—except as mere acquaintance. We shouldn't think of them as partners for life, or any thing of that kind, you know."

Harry darted a swift glance at the young girl, but her eyes were bent upon the coffee-pot, and only the smallest corner of a smile was peeping out from behind her dimples.

"If my interest in the country deepens as rapidly as it threatens to, I shall be unable to tear myself away," he said.

The spinster looke I flattere I; that winning tone and polite bow set her ancient heart in a flatter, under its white vandyke; but her niece raised her pretty head with a sudden pride, which warned the young gentleman to be more discreet in his compliments.

"At least, I shall long remember this day," he continue l, "for this is the first camp-meeting I ever attended."

"It's a purty spot for a campin'-ground," remarked the squatter.

The smoke curling up among the trees from more than a score of tiny fires; the groups gathered about them; the neighing of horses; the odors of violets and moss, blended with the flavors of the cooking; the gleam of the silver lake; the hum of conversation; the dim recesses opening back in the woods; the curiously-contrasted figures of the motley assembly; the occasional shout of "hall-hight!" and "glory!" from some happy soul; blent with the whoop of mischievous boys, all went to make up a vivid picture, as novel as it was interesting.

"I don't wonder that last preacher labore last har last if he was thru him't corn, when I think what a sit he's fightin' with the devil for," continued Mr. Carter, while his guist's eyes dwelt thou ditably upon the some. "That's some of the hard-st cases in this crowd there is in the hull State, and that's sayin' a good deal; for, if ever a State was overrun with wickedness, it's Michigaa. Some folks thinks Arkansaw is wass, and mebbe it is; but to my thinkin', this is gettin' to be about as bad as it can. Why, sir, a third of this ere crowd is backless and horse-thickes. They allers 'tend campem clin'. It's a rood place to get too ther, and so what's goin' on. But once and a while one on 'em gets caught before he knows it. Some hard-fisted minister knocks the truth right into him, and he jest gives up. Sometimes, praps, just as he's thinkin' up the orfallest wickedness, he'll swaller somethin' he's heard, and it'll stick in his throat like a fish-hook, and he can't get away, no, sir! he's caught the bait, and is brill, spite of himself, straight into the kingdom. One of them that was baptized this noon was Jeff Grimes, one of the hardest cases in the country. He's been in state-prison twice for counterfeitin' and horse-stealin'; he can swar a blue streak, git a illow's watch while he's talkin' as frien lly as pie with him, an l run off any horse he gits his eye on. He came here, I exp. t, to ply his trade; but last night, a bullet from the ritle of the Lord's soldier, who was a firin' away from the pulpit thur, hit him plump in the conscience, and down he went on the ground. as if he was dead. Some of the ministers and women was a workin' over him half the night. He was in a frightful state of mind. Towards mornin' he got happier, and to day he's been baptized. One such conversion as that encourages them poor preachers to a hull year of work. They hard times, them preachers do. They run all kinds et dangers; set down by anybody's hearthstone that'll give 'em a bel and a meal, and don't ask nothin' but enough to keep 'em alive. I ain't a member of any church, but I till you what, my cabin is always free to 'em. As for sister D bby here, it's the delight of her life to have a premier st prin' at the house;" and the farmer smile! good-nature livest her. "There's an extra allowance of errs in the johnny-cake, and maple-sugar in the tea on them occasions. It six diat marry a Methodist minister yet, it won't be because she hasn't striven hard enough to that end."

Oh, brother, now you get out! I shall always do my day to the servants of the Lord, be they marrial or oth rwise. But I'm by no means set on one for a hast and the later of man—that is, one not specially bad, would not be refeel by me if I wished to marry, which you know, I do not. The pire always teasing me about matrimony," she continued, with a youthful smile directed to their guest, "when nothing can be further from my thoughts. You won't mind them, now, will you, sir?" with a slight coquettishness. "If I wished to assume connubial relations, I should have done so years a continued that is, a few years ago, before I was twenty. It is a maximum so painful to refuse the solicitations of the other sex, and so distressing to witness the despair hurled upon a noble heart by an unmitigated negative, that I have several times been almost induced—but of this no more."

"It must be a cruel task for the fair and gentle hand of woman to perform so severe a work as that of heaping despair upon a breaking heart," responded Harry, with a gallantry that was delightful to its recipient. "But, perhaps, all are not so sensitive to giving pain as yourself. Some women, I could imagine, would take pleasure in tormenting the hearts in their power;" and he looked over at Susan.

"Aunt Debby, they're going to sing."

"Oh, my! I must join them, then. They need my help very much. You will put away the things, Susan;" and she hurried forward into the ring which surrounded the minister, who was leading the hymn.

Harry could clearly distinguish that shrill voice rising above all others, and soaring alone through the tree-tops with an ear-piercing exultation that was surprising.

"If you want to talk on business," said the squatter, "come down here under the shelter of that little bank by the lake. We can set there and talk, undisturbed. It ain't Lardly respectful to be taking care of our worldly affairs right here in the very hearin' of the gospel. When the things are put away, you'd better join your aunt, Susan;" and the two men strolled out of the crowd, down to a cool and quiet nook, where a mound in the land had shelved off into the water, leaving half the roots of the tree it held, exposed to the air, and beneath those roots a dry beach of silvery sand, and a flat stone, upon which they sented themselves to discuss business.

CHAPTER II.

SQUATTER'S TROUBLES.

When this talk was over, the two arose, and Harry Garliner, looking flushed and displeased, mounted his horse, and rode along in search of the nearest tavern, while Russ Carter, pale with anger, moved hither and thither in the congregation, speaking to this one and that, who immediately has their places, and followed him out of hearing of the mediate into the depths of the grove, where violent words and excited grant tures broke forth without restraint.

When Harry had started for the West to look up his property, and claim his rights, he had small idea of the district had and even dangerous nature of his business. He had hard that a whole band of emigrants, from one of the castern state, had squatted upon his land the previous year. He was surry for the disappointment they must suffer when they found they had appropriated purchased land; but he felt, at the same time, that they should have been more careful in their chains the was resolved to pay them, as far as was in his power, for the improvements they had made, or to sell them their farms for the sum he had paid for them, which was cortainly a just and generous offer; very generous, since he purch a literal ulate, and had expected to sell for a handsome always.

But the moment he opened the subject with Mr. Cart r. the man had grown angry and unreasonable. There had been with others in their vicinity, so much trouble in the same way, or by squatters not entering their land, and having it way, ward sold from them, that one of those deep and deally projectices, which took such rank hold in new and ign rank communities, had sprung up among these squatters, and they had sworn to yield their assumed rights to no man. Canaling to the West with just means enough to put up a shorty to shelter them, and to pay for provisions until they call raise them, they settled wherever they pleased, without paying the government for their farms, and, in many cases, without entering them; so that, when the land came to be surveyed and put up for sale, it was bought away from them.

In this particular case, they had chanced upon a section already sold to Harry Gardiner, who, having money which he wished to invest, had employed an agent to look up promising western land for him. He had paid the government price for it, and lain out of his money two years, and he naturally felt very little like abandoning his claim.

On the other hand, these men, in their ignorance, somewhat mistaking the nature of the laws, and firmly believing that in the new country men were entitled to all they could cultivate, had, unfortunately, put their little worldly-all into improvements. For over a year they had worked hard, enduring the privations of settler's lives. They had built themselves log-cabins, and filled them with rude farmiture. All winter they had felled trees and split fence-rails, and now the grain had just been barvested for the first time, from the fields they had fenced in. As for a dling these places for the bare worth of the improvements, and taking their wives and little ones to another wilderness, there to pass through another soils of hardships, was not to be thought of peaceably. And as to paying even government prices for their farms, it would take the gains of three years to do it at bast.

After setting fire to the smollering passions of his companions, Mr. Carter set aside, thinking gloomily of the threatened misfertime. The picture of his neat for cabin, with its two rooms and a loft, reservividly before him. He saw the will rose which Sasun had planted, clambering over the window, and the lattle verstable garden in the rear, and the horder of will blue violets around the front of the house. He had promised himself to buy a yoke of oxen with the money medical the grain this year, that he middle have the wherewithal to raise a larger crop another season. But all that money, and all he could carn for several years, would be swallowed up, and he would be still poor, and crippled for want of machinery to work with. Or, if he abandon of the place, there was that weary beginning over a min. Sugan's basy fingers and pretty tastes had already invested his cabin with the charms of home; the neighbors were, most of them, old acquaintances, and life had begun to look promising and cherrful, before this thunder-cloud gathered in their sky.

"Sue's seventeen now, and when she's twenty I shall be as bad off as I am now. Industrious and careful as she is. I shan't have nothing to set her up in life with, and buy her the fixin's she deserves, if she should take it into her head to get married. I don't care so much for myself, nor even for sister Debby; but Sue—I swear I'll fight to the death her re I give up an inch."

Enos Carter was the leading man in the band of neight rs who had come west together; not on account of bing any richer than the rest of them, for he was not; but he had rather more elucation than the others, and a good deal of our utive talent; and there had been a time when he was in easy circrimstances. Susan had snugly laid away in the ellifashion 1 bureau, which was one of the few articles of turnibure til v had brought with them, many relies of the form r later cotote of her parents; carefully preserved garments of that mother, who died when she was a little girl. There was linen sheets and pillow-cases, spun and woven by their own r for the bridge outfit; the welding-dress itself, of him is the line cade; a black lace vail; a set of silver tea-spoons, and three land spoons; a string of gold beads, which Sus in som times by white forth on festive occasions. The very white dress which she had worn to the camp-meeting had once been her mother's, and was the finest of old-fashioned India mull, tucked half way up the skirt, and with real thread-lace sewel around the neek. Other remains there were of those articles of dress and firmities, common to the best class of eastern farmers, whose decides rivaled those of their city consins in solid education, it is in showy accomplishments. Susm's mother had be a the billion of her county when she was a girl; she could paint in water colors; write as handsome a hand as the writing must require equal to the smartest young man; and dance better then my other girl on the shores of Lake Omario. Sien was an original child; her mother had died when the was a little tin and her father's sister, Deborah, had taken her places to be ager of the householl. Aunt D by had a good many hills weaknesses, and was by no means so good at the a up a young maiden as the mother would have been, had she been spared; but Susan, by means of inherited grace and good sense, grew up as much like her mother as possible. It was not strange that this child was the idol of her father; and that, when reverses came upon him, and times grew hard, and living poor in their native State, he resolved, for less sike, to emigrate to a new country, where a few years of labor would enable him to gratify his ambition for her.

Thinking all this over, and the many disappointments of his life, in connection with the new trouble coming upon him, the squatter rose, and strode among the high-talking company.

"Neighbors and friends," said he, "I swar, for one, to fight it out."

"And I," "and I," echoed all the rest.

"We'll hang that danditied youngster on the nearest tree, before we'll allow him to interfere with what's ours," exclaimed a low-bred, ugly-looking man, the roughest of the set.

"No, no, neighbor; we'll not make ourselves liable to the law," interposed Enos Carter; "but we'll scare him out of it. We'll frighten him, so he won't want to show his face in these parts again."

"We'll give him a coat of tar and feathers; ha! ha! ha! It'll become him better than the broadcloth coat he wears," spoke another.

"We've get plenty of rails-we'll give him a rile," joinel a third.

Out of all the number, there was not one man to acknowle be the rights of the young landowner, or to place his position in the light of justice before the rest—o does all interest blind the eyes, and projudice deafen the ears of people; and when this two are united with ignorance, the result may be dreated, both by large institutions and by single individuals. All good which might have resulted from the preaching, was now overthrown in the disturbed mind of Mr. Carter; and upon returning to camp, he struck his tent, packed up its contents in the wayon, hitched to it the one horse, which had led his only servent through the labors of the year, called his sist rand daughter away from the sermon, and drove home in ominous silence.

Susan was buried in thought between wondering what had come over her father, and what had become of the interesting stranger who had dined with them, and whether she should ever see him again, recalling his pleasant voice and that unstudied ease, so different from the bashful awkwardness of the neighboring young men. Aunt Deborah was dwelling on the cloquence of a certain bachelor minister, half-unle at his the pre-occupied minds of the other two, until she saidenly broke away from the matter in hand by exclaiming: "Lat I wonder what's become of that Mr. Gardiner! I thought, likely, as he'd business with you, he'd go home with you. He was a sweet young man, and so polite."

"Cuss his politeness!" broke forth the farmer so steraly, that Susan involuntarily drew away from his side, as if the whip he flourished might descend upon her. "I'd like to give him a good horsewhipping with this very whip; and I will yet, and he don't look out for himself, the secundrel."

"What has he done, father?" asked Susan, her heart sinking, for she had, even more than she was aware, formed a very favorable opinion of the stranger.

In words by no means softly chosen, the spritter infract his family of the nature of Mr. Gardiner's business, and of the sworn resolve of those concerned to repel him.

"But, father," said Susan, gently, "I don't see why yet speak so bitterly of him. It seems to me it's not his toult, but our misfortune. For my part, I'd rather get along just as we have, and go without every thing, to pay for our land, than to feel that I had wronged the rightful owner out of it."

"And who's the rightful owner, I'd like to know?" retreed the father, firmly. "Go I made this earth to be free to all; and whoever takes wild land, and clears it, and cultivates it, makes it his own—he's a right to it. What right have the men that never did a day's work in their lives, coming all az and takin' the bread out of our mouths? We've best up our minds that we'll put a rope around that young decly by

"That's him, now, standing in the door of Gles' tar ma" said Deborah.

Giles' tavern was a two-story house of square likes, stunding on the edge of the road in a piece of woods, about two miles from the cabin of Mr. Carter. He had intended to water his horse at the trough in front, but upon hearing the exclamation of his sister, he drove straight past, without looking in that direction. Susie stole a timid glance, and thought the young gentleman handsomer than ever, as he lifted his straw hat respectfully in reply to her half-repressed nod. He looked so manly and honest, she would not believe that he intended to oppress and injure them; and she recretted the angry mood into which her father had worked himself.

Their little home, shadowed by oaks, and trellised with will-roses and morning-glories, the seeds of which Susie had brought with her from the East, looked so peaceful and comfortable, after a two days' absence, that it increased the salness weighing upon all hearts. The rays of the declining sun streamed under the trees, and lighted up the door brilliantly, showering gold dust all over the white dress and brown tresses of Susie, as she sprang out of the wagon, and ran to open the cabin.

But the farmer only grumbled at the auspicious omen.

CHAPTER III.

A SCENE AT MIDNIGHT.

GILES' tayern was the head-quarters of a great many different classes of people; as it was the best and almost the only stopping-place between two far-apart towns. Speculaters and buyers of land were sometimes compelled to step there days at a time. It had all the chance custom of ordinary travel; and, though well kept and respectable, no doubt gam! lers frequently found it convenient to assemble there; and it was well known that a gang of counterfeiters had once carried on their nefarious business in one of its upper apartments. Small no 1, however, was there of counterfeiting in those days of will-cat banks, when anybody who had a little real or assum lirecrty, could set up a bank for himself. After the disaster of 1836-7, the people of Michigan wanted money, and the oddiging legislature passed laws which enabled every man to make it for himself. Thousands of these worthless notes the l the State, and if the excitable, inconsistent popular, now lynching a man who asked to have his notes released, and then burning in effigy the officers of the very banks they difended—if this populace did make a run on one of the persliar institutions, it was very apt to find that in return i'r anv quantity of nice paper currency, there was a diller and flay cents in copper coin in the vaults of the lank, and said spayined horses, broken-down carriages, and unsalthe city water-lots, out of it for their security. All of which is by-theway.

Harry Gardiner had been several days at the tavers. He had visited all the squatters who had settled on his land, and made them the propositions we mentioned in the borineis. but they had all shown a spirit which convinced him that affairs could not be amicably arranged, and he was now about to employ an attorney to recover his rights for him.

Although they had brought it on themselves, they were doubly infuriated at the prospect of the trouble and expense of going to law. The landlord of the tavern had warned him of personal danger, but Harry was brave, and laughed at the idea. He carried, as all travelers in those days did, a brace of pistols; though he would have disdained to use them in any common encounter. If a man attacked him with his fists, he would use the same weapons, and he was not afraid of the burliest of the grumblers.

On the particular evening of which we are writing, he had noticed a larger crowd than usual gathered in the bar-room to drink whiskey and talk over the affairs of the day. Among these loungers were almost all the squatters who were at enmity with him. He observed, without much caring for, their hovering glances and muttered threats. As they would not be friendly with him, and he had no taste for bar-room revelry, he retired early to the little room which he occupied, and spent the evening writing letters. At eleven o'clock, the light was still shining from his window, for he had got in the mood for clearing up all delinquent correspondence. He had just seale l the last letter, when there came a light tap at his door; he opened, and beheld with surprise, Susan Carter standing there, her face pale and hands trembling. She stepped in as he uncheed the door, and herself shut it behind them. She had on a large camlet cloak, though it was an August night, and a Luge sun-bonnet, which she pushed back as she entered. "You are in danger, and I have come to warn you of it," she whisperci. "Danger?" asked the young man, half incredulously, leoking into the pale young face, whose eyes were unnaturally bright.

Would never forgive if he knew I had stolen through the would never forgive if he knew I had stolen through the woods to warn you, and I should be disgraced if they found has here. But I could not help it—I could not keep still and know that an innocent person was going to be injured, perhaps much red, who knows? That Dan Sturgiss is an ugly fellow, and he's the ringleader. As soon as Aunt Debby was in bed, I stole out and run all the way. I've been half an hour watching a chance to slip in the back door."

"But what is this terrible danger, my dear child?"

"You need not smile, Mr. Gardiner. You may be brave, but they are too many for you. The squatters have made up their minds to get rid of you. They're gathering down in the bar-room now, and the landlord dare not tell you. At 'mil-night they are to take you out of bed, tar-and-flather you, and ride you out of the county. They will disgrace you, if they don't kill you."

"And you do not wish to see me distraced? You are very generous to risk so much for me, Miss Carter."

She blushed deeply, but continued hurriedly in an implaring tone.

"Do fly while you have a chance. There is no care in this side of the house; you can blow out the light, and drop down from the window—it is not far."

"I shall not fly," said the young man, decide ily.

"Indeed, indeed, Mr. Gardiner, I heard them talking about the creek, and about giving you a good ducking. You do not know what such men as Dan Sturgiss will do, when they're roused. They'll be sure to drown you. And father will be mixed up in it," she added, bursting into tears.

"I shall shoot the two first men who enter my room, and then turn in and thrash the rest;" and he drew a deplicath. As this moment, they heard feet cautiously ascending the stairs, and whispers in the passage. Susan clasped her hands. There was no fastening to the door but a stout button; this Harry turned, and then throwing up the window, he said the girl by the waist—"You must not be compromisal," he said, and lifting her through the window, he lowered her by one of her arms as far as possible, and let her drop.

The men by this time were pushing at the dor. Taking up his pistols, which lay upon the stand at which he had been writing. Harry stood, awaiting the onsharcht of the introduct. One push of a powerful shoulder, and the dor yield have vealing a score of determined men, their faces bearing with revenge and hate. The cool, firm demeaner of the man they had expected to capture asleep in his bed, somewhat danned them, coupled as it was, by the brace of pictols held up unswervingly.

"The first who steps a foot inside this door is a double man," he said, as they made a motion to enter.

There was a moment's pause. The huge form of Dan Sturgiss, almost filled the door, hesitating at the deadly look of the weapons before him.

"Oh, cuss it, if that's yer game, I'm up to 't," he muttered, and quick as thought he drew a pistol from his pocket and fired.

He had not paused to take steady aim, but bounded forward the instant he firel; but he was met in that first step by a shot which leveled him to the floor. The next man behind him was Enes Carter. With a whoop of fury the party pressed forward, now that blood had been shed, careless of resalts. Harry fired his last pistol, and Carter staggered to the wa'l. Harry saw that it was him, with a pang of regret; but he was fighting in self-defense, and he dared not pause to repent. Now that his weapons were exhausted, the room filled with his a milants; one, two, three, he leveled with a chair, and then, the ling that numbers must certainly overpower him, and not afraid of any imputation of cowardice after the manar in which he had met the enemy, he seized a favorable instent, and sprang through the window still open behind him. He cought the helpe of the window with his hand, and hung a - c a i, that he might drop with less force upon his feet, driped and run. Two or three sprang out after him, and others deshed down the stries in prusuit. A forest lay back of the tivern, into whose depths he plunged; but he had run but a short distance but re his ankle, which he had sprained in laping from the window, gave out, and refuel to a int him Some of his pursuers had lighted torches, and under the discouraging circumstances he resolved to climb a tree. where thick foliage would screen him, where, perched in its more tranches, he awaited the result of this unexpected affair.

With his ankle giving him great physical pain, and with his mind distressed at the probability of his having taken human life, he remained in his uncomfortable situation until long after the merning broke. Weary and hungry, and feeling that the community at large ought to bear him out in the course he had taken, whatever the squatters themselves might design, he finally descended from his concludent and limped back to the tayern. Sparse as was the sate ment, quite a crowd had collected about the house, and as soon as he made his appearance a constable advanced from it with a warrant for his arrest for the murder of Daniel Sturgiss, and for making an assault with intent to kill, upon Enos Carter.

"Was Carter much hurt?" was the first question he asked.

"Can't tell yet whether it'll be fatal or not. The doctor thinks he's dangerous," replied the constable.

"Where is he?"

" Home."

"Poor Susie," murmured Harry, to himself.

The prisoner only asked for some breakfast, and to have his ankle bandaged, and to get some papers from his reom; and then he was marched away amid the admiration of some of the crowd, and the fierce threats and imprecations of others. The jail was a log edifice, similar to the tavern, with the exception of strong bolts, and iron bars across the win lows. It was about four miles from the tavern, and the ristons crowl who escorted the prisoner, passed the cabin of Enos Carer on its way. There they paused, and would have given wills of vengeance, had not the doctor appeared at the docr, n. tining them to be silent. The prisoner cast a longing, regretted glance at the little house, but he saw no one save the doctor. and rode on in silence until he came to the prison in which he was so suddenly to be shut out from business and planting from sunshine and liberty, to ponder in solitude the unplace and ness of his position.

CHAPTER IV.

THE TRIAL-VERDICT-THE MOB.

The faneral of Dan Sturgiss was a curious affair. Half the county attended it; and it was more like a triumphant procession them a funeral march, when they wended their way to the grave, so excited was the populace, and so loud the whispers and deep the oaths which disturbed it. As the coffin was lowered into the ground, and the first shovelful of earth rattled upon it, the men who had borne it on their shoulders to the spot, and who were the same concerned in the conspiracy against the one who had caused this death, clasped hands across the unfilled grave, and swore to attempt vengeance upon the murderer, should the law full to convict him.

Weeping and distracted, with five little ones, frightened and crying, clinging about her, the widow, in her poor garments, and with only a piece of black ribbon on her bonnet for mourning, was a sight sufficient of itself to rouse her neighbors to hatred and revenge against him who had brought this upon her. It is true that Dan had been a bad husband, had provided very illy for her, and that she could scarcely be work off without than with him,—but all this was forgotten now, both by herself and her friends. A contribution was taken up on the spot, each of the squatters, with whom money was the scarcest of articles, giving what few shillings change he had in his pocket, and some of the better classes, who had come from here and there out of curiosity to hear the story, giving a dollar or two apiece, -- so that Mrs. Sturgis took back to her log-hut more money than she had ever possessed at one time before—sufficient to lay in a store for Winter, both of food and clothing.

None of that pitying crowd who witnessed her distress had a thought for the wordless misery which would have come upon a pleasant Eastern home, where a fond mother and beautiful sisters spent their evenings recalling the many virtues of the only son and brother, had Harry Gardiner, their pride and idol, allowed himself to be dragged to an ignominious death by these very compassionate men.

From the funeral the crowd hurried away to the justice's office, a shanty set up in the shadow of the jail, where, at three o'clock, the prisoner was to go through the formality of a preliminary examination. When he was brought forth from the jail, and obliged to pass through a dense crowd in or hr to reach the office, a man with a grain of cowardice in his composition would have betrayed some shrinking from the sea of threatening faces surging about him, and the wild cries, the shaking fists, and muttered oaths. But Harry never even changed color. His bearing won the admiration of every one who had not some personal motive in dillking him. He was not slow to perceive that he had almost as many friends as enemies. There were lan lholders and rich men scattered through the county, who had had great troille with the squatters, and these, of course, sympathized with And as the worst of men always set a high value up n physical courage, Harry had also a large body of friends among the dregs of the collected crowd.

The squatters had tried to get up a concerted movem at for seizing the prisoner, and inflicting summary punishment with their own hands; they displayed a stout, new rope, and mode other demonstrations, but the opposing party were so numerous that they finally concluded to wait a better opportunity.

Court sat the first of September, and it was now have in August; the prisoner waived any defense at present, and after a brief examination, was remanded back to juil to await his trial.

The jail was at the crossing of two roads; and with a small log structure, which was dignified as a court-house, a lawy ris office and house in one, the justice's office, and half a destructure tenements, made up a little village. There was a tavern, of course, but its reputation for fried chick n and clean beds was not equal to Giles' tovern, and it was there are less patronized, except at cour-time, when it overflowed even into the neighboring houses.

It was after dark of the fifth day of his incarceration, as Herry sat in his room, thinking of home, and how uncomfortable the chain about his leg felt,—for as the jail was not very seare, they had made sure of him, by chaining him—and of what his mother and sisters would feel if they knew his situation, and kind of dumbly wondering, as people in great emergencies will, whether he, Harry Cardiner, so young, so well-to-do, so active, so much interested in himself and the world, would really, in a few brief weeks, be cut off from his career on earth by a hangman's rope. These thoughts were drifting through his mind like black shadows through the air, when his jailer drew the bolts and admitted a visitor to see him.

Harry had already received a good many calls, which the jailer, who was secretly friendly to him, had permitted, and he was not much surprised at this. The dim light of the one smoky lamp did not reveal very clearly the features of his visitor, who appeared to be a tall, slender man, in very ill-fitting clother, and who had a basket in his hand, which had previously been examined by the juiler. As soon as the latter had retired, the slouched hat drawn over his face was lifted, and Harry, to his astonishment, gradually recalled the face of no other a person than Miss Deborah Carter. A sweet hope that Susan had commissioned her with some mes age, sprang up in his heart—he had so wished to hear if Susan hated him beyond forgiveness for the injury he had inflicted on her father. The thought of the suffering he must have caused her, had troubled him more than his own concerns.

"Miss Carter!" he exclaimed, springing up and darting ferward a step, jerked back again by the chain, whose presence he had forgotten.

"He! he! Mr. Gardiner, I hope you won't consider me in lelicate, appearing in your presence in man's attire. Nothing but—but—you newst understand me—my pity for your situation could have—in luced me to such a step—I—"

"Did Miss Susan send you?"

"Sasan! no indeed, not she! you might hang for all she cares. Ever since her father was brought in, she's done nothin' but tend him, and cry."

"How is he?"

[&]quot;Well, he's been had; but he's a little better. I know it must seem heartless in his only sister to be bringing pie and cake to the man that came so nigh to murdering him,—and that's why I borrowed his clothes, to come in. If the neighbors should find it out, they'd shame me out of the community. But"-with a deep sigh-" I couldn't help it. Ever since the first moment of our acquaintance, I've felt differently to you from what I ever did to any other of the male sex. I'd have died before you should have guessed it, if this thing hadn't happened. But how could I know your danger an l conceal my bursting heart? I knew Mrs. Green was an awill cook, and so I just took the liberty of bringing you some of my own pumpkin pie and pound-cake. I've took every pains with 'em, and I know they're nice. Oh, sir! you'll never guess the feelings that overcame me as I was beating up the eggs for that cake,"—and a profound sigh, which was alm st a groan, attested to her sincerity.

Surprised and confused by this unexpected confision from the tall spinster, Harry blushed like a girl at the avowal of her first lover, murmuring—"I'm really greatly obliged to you, Miss Carter, both for these nice catables, and for the interest you have expressed in my case. I feel quite hop ful of a good result. I really cannot make up my mind that I am to die the death of a convicted murderer."

"If you should ever be released, you'll forget the belines of your unhappy Deborah, won't you, now !--promise me !"

"I can not promise to forget your kindness. We usually remember with gratitude those who are kind to us in our dark hours."

Poor Deborah! she was really undoubtedly in love; and that strange mi-take under which mailens of her age often seem to labor, with regard to their charms, and the imperceptibility of their age, had inspired her with a faint hope that her devotion might win a response. Poor Deborah indeed!who all this time the man to whom she had committed herself, was only thinking what sweet rapture would have been his, if, instead of this grenadier aunt, there had come stealing into his cell that shy, bright, beautiful niece, to make him the same confession. For, just as singularly, as pious, particular Debby had suddenly succumbed to his good qualities, had Harry been enchanted by the fresh beauty and purity of Susan Carter. And since he had been confined to that wearisome prison-room, he had thought so much of that pule, lovely apparition appearing to warn him of his danger, and of a deeper feeling than pity which, he fancied, he had detected in her tremulous tones, that she seemed to him an old acquaintance,-a sweet star which had always shone upon his lite, instead of a transient light which had beamed upon him once or twice.

"Don't, don't, my dear Miss Carter, pray don't give way so," he pleaded, in distress, as her sobs accumulated. "Indeed, I have a very—very high respect for you,—and I stadl always remember your pound-cake—and—and—and—your pound-cake—and—and—and—your pour pounds ion for her, he came very near putting his arm about that virgin waist, and consoling her with a kiss.

But we need not attempt to describe his situation to those of our young Lily realers who have been in a similar one with a fellow being of the other sex. Almost to his relief, the julier knowled at the door to signify that the half hour of the interview hal expired. Hastily slouching her hat over her eyes, and taking up the empty basket, where contents now enlivened Harry's lonely table, she whispered in his car—without july or jury. But I don't believe they'll be allowed to. You've friends as well as enemies. Oh, dear, dear! if I could plan out some way to get you out of this, I'd do it, whether you married me or not."

What did Miss Same say when they brought her father have?" taked Harry, detaining her a moment, as she's jucezed his hand.

"I'm sure I don't precisely recollect what the silly thing said. I b'lieve she said—'I should think he might have chosen out somebody besides my father.'"

"Of course she would say that," murmured the prisener.

"Well, good-by, and God bless you."

At this the spinster would have broken out afresh, but the door opened, and the fear of detection repressed her. Again squeezing his hand hysterically, she departed; from that time forward to the day of the trial, Harry did not want for delicacies to satisfy the cravings of physical hunger, though he, the worshiped, affectionate boy at home, was sometimes sorely famished for a word of love or a gentle cares. Yet, as he had refused such as was offered him, it was a prepar punishment that he should be deprived of all other.

That terrible day arrived within a fortnight. Peril had come from a circuit of fifty miles to be present at the trial. An unusual interest was aroused by the party character of the case, the squatters and their associates being again t, and the richer class of the community for the prisoner. Every hard in the settlement was thronged with strangers, glad of the privilege of sleeping on the floor where beds could not be hold. every man had formed and expressed an opinion. Three days were consumed in this tedious business, telions, but allimportant; -- for, should their be a preponderance of spacer influence among the jury, the chances of the a man 1 ve ... 1 be small indeed. Harry's lawyer informed him that the jury was as good a one as could have been expected, and that he did not believe they should have any serious trenth in corrying the case through to a triumphant issue. Harry int that his object was to imfase him with contact and sail proudly. His was a nature, that if he had he was he was marching to certain death, would never have allowed an unfair enemy a moment of triumph.

The majority of the mass of people gathered in and about the little court house, on the day of trial, had never bit it the primar, and when he was experted by a stout gath in the the juil to the bar, he had to encounter the order doctor at the stout of a time.

sand eager eyes. His youth, his beauty, and the singular franka, soff his two pression, complet with a bearing of quiet courage, won upon a portion of the multitude, just as it excited that envious hatred of the lower classes, which is of all hatred the most deadly.

The lawyer employed by the State, was a man ambitious of power, and feeling it for his interest to secure the good-will of the voting majority—the people, he put forth his best efforts to them, and convict the prisoner of wilful murder. Harry was not really much afraid of a verdict of wilful murder, but he did fear a verdict of manshaughter, and a sentence to more or less years of imprionment. So horrible a possibility booming up in place of the light-hearted visions with which he had the feature, was enough to dismay him—but he would not be dismayed.

With a slight flush of the check and sparkle of the eye, he set quietly listening to the various witnesses for the prosecution. Their testimony did not always appear to good advante, pottle hot passion, the blind rage, showed forth to visibly; and they were trequently taken aback and convicted of untruch and inclusionary by the cool questioning of the counsel for the defense. Whenever this was the result, it seemed to only an errand excite the shock-headed squatters who filled the windows, doors, and the area without, to suffication.

The only witness called for the defense, was the tavernkeep r, who testified to the threats made in his presuce a rainst the safety of the prisoner; that he had warned him of daner; that the purpose of the men who assaulted the door of his assault, if not murder.

Herry was well aware that the testimony of Sasan Carter, would be valuable to him; but not even to enhance his own alone is of safety, would be summon her as a witness, and bettery the part she had played in coming to his room to warn him. He would not call that molest girl before all those glaring eyes, and bring the dislike of her own people upon her by each limit her to testify against them.

What was his surprise, therefore, after Giles had taken his said, to see his lawyer make way for a vailed figure which cane timility ferward to the witness-box, and there throwing up the vall, disclosed the face of Sasan Carter. She was a last I do and thin from the fatigue of was hing with her father; but when she met the eyes of the prisoner, and the brilliant light which immediately came into them, a deep blush for an instant suffused her cheeks.

She give the story of Mr. Gardiner's acquaintines with her father—of what had passed between them to her knowledge on the subject of the lands—of the excited state of her taker and others—of their sworn purpose to get rid of the real owner of the lands at all risks—of their plot on the night of the a-calt—to dip him in the creek, and perhaps drown him—of her own visit to the young man's apartment for the purpose of putting him on his guard.

"You must have taken a very peculiar interest in the prisoner, to give yourself so much trouble, and run such risks of your reputation for a stranger," remarked the attorney for the State; and the vulgar crowd jeered and laughed at the insination implied in his manner.

"It was not too much trouble to take to prevent an innocent man from being murdered. I would take as much pains to prevent such a deed, as you would, sir, to hely it will. You are paid, sir, to support the cause of justic—"at your sense of justice and mine are different."

The young maiden, whose every expression was claring both of modesty and innocence, made this reply in so clar and firm a tone, looking the impertinent counselor full in the face with such honest scorn, that for a moment beauty and truth prevailed, and a wild hurral of acchanging went up from the quicksilver crowd.

The court was called to order, and the fair with a removed. The electric smile which played over the court nance of Henry, as she gave him a hurried glance in retiring, was reward enough for the trial it had been to her timid nature to dare the scrutiny of so many eyes in his bolable.

The speches of the counsel on either side, were their less efforts. The rights and wrongs of the land question were discussed in connection with the case; and both pattern the best which could be said of their respective chains.

It was night long before the judge gave his charge to the jury. He was a product judge, and on have related han to neither side; and the jury were not very clearly onlighten has to what was expected of them. Not until they had been lo kel in a small room in the rear of the court-house, with the is the flitt and death in their hands, did the throng which hall ben stan Eng, panting for breath, and half smother I for Lours, think of the wants of the body. Now they bestired the and lives in a arch of a drink of liquor, and a bit of luncheon, I'm s are ly any would pause to take a comfortable supper, for I ar oil sing the return of the varliet.

As hour after hour pased, and the jury did not appear, the In. as grew mere and more excited. Some plot was evidently he ling up among the cyll-disposel. There was a clumor which thrown I to bring the court-house about the cars of the july and his assitants; the fieble power of the constabla could no more subdue it than a feather could breast the wind.

All at once there was a profound stillne. -- the jury were defiling into their box.

"Gull men of the jury, what is your verdict?"

The reply of the foremen was clear and emphatic.

"Not Guilty."

A full and free acquittal was almost more than Harry had L ; I for, but he bore the triamph as he had the peril.

Imm Intly up in the breathless silence, aross a tremendo suprem. The shout of exultation which are from one sile, was drowned in the yells and howls of his disappointed en mis. The tumult was more than momentary; it incre-iinstal of leaning; there was struggling and blows at the d ray-resillen rash, and the man who had just be n I by the law, was a ized by the mob and drarred out into the open air.

Harry for hit like a worm ted lion, but he was overpowered, his arms till him his back, and he was impelled about in the direct near the woods. It now become evident that he water victim of a plat, which had be a hat him up duing the state july, in the harmonic invict l. A hundr lann, am l with balel gar, femel about him, and mer led him off Smooth brward on here, milita reat digly of arop, which they bell up in the religiate of the ter has the y health hit. It was now milnight. The was non-relatively. The ming wind moved the will Lines of the plan knots to and mo, and casting into shadow, and now lighing up, the eager, mad lened, devilish faces of the young man's persecutors. For when men yield themselves up with delight to the full sway of their worst passions, they become devils in good earnest.

Those were terrible moments to Harry Garliner. He thought of the anguish of his mother when she should he are it his untimely end; and the sorrow of the sisters whose protector he was, rushed over him, driving the color from his fact which fear could never change. He prayed for his blovel ones, still confronting his scowling captors with duratless eyes.

They hurried him along. Others, his friends, were following to the rescue. Defiant cries were interchanged—there was skirmishing and confusion—torches were knocked out of their holders' hands and trampled on in a moment of comparative darkness. Harry was soized, his bonds were est, and he was lifted on to a horse, and told to ride for his life. He struck his horse and started on, and just as the bondire which had been kindled to light his execution, spranginto blaze he side the forest road, his en mies saw him riding past, his brown hair floating in the wind, and his hand moving over his head with a gesture of triumphant forewell.

Presently he seemed to change his mind, for he turned and role back in the full glow of the bonfire, where he pared.

His friends seeing the rash act, formed around him.

"Gentlemen," he cried, in a volve like a silver tramp t, "I will not ren from you, as if I were a felon the ing final jestice. I have been acquitted by the laws of the land—what more would you have of me?

paid for by my agent. I find others have taken passes in crist. What do I do? Do I seize upon it said ally an half they have put on it, as I have a right to do by hav? Not I give them all the time they ask to pay for what they with. I do for to pay them for every improvement they have made. If they wish to leave. I do not harry them. I do not discuss in them. I give up my own properts of gine as a simple of generosity to the emen, have they are por, and have halfles. And how do they repay may? They said to be room at midnight, to seize may be years large in the large may get rid of their duty by march ling may. This is the colo of honor of these men! But I have been placed on my grard; with my weapons I protected my room, and warn them against advancing. They fire upon me. In self-protection, as it was my daty to do, I defended myself, and one of their number was slain and another wounded.

"You do not like this? You would ask me to give up my property—if not that, my like! I must not even defend my-s It! A curious demand, you will confess.

"I shall have this place when my business is settled, and I fold inclined. In the mean time, if any man or number of men, think best to assail me, let them try it."

So saying, he rode on, back to Giles' tavern, unharmed by the fary which was alrealy cowering before his cool self-possession.

This was the last outward demonstration made at that time against the young harlowner; but the spirit of hatrel was only a little more concealed—not driven out.

CHAPTER V.

THE SQUATTER'S WIDOW.

"What on arth, Susan, are you sewing them two red diamonds together for, instead of a red and a white one? It's a pretty rising sun you'll have on your best quilt, if you go on at that rate. I believe you're dead in love, the way you go on lately."

"Judged by your rule, Aunt Debby, you must be pretty well smitten yourself. You know you spread the table-claim on the bed last evening, and put the test to stop in a figingpan."

"Nonsense!" retorted Deborah, turning as red as her sallow skin would permit; "and if I did, I guess it was because I had more to do than I could turn my hand to. You're getting to be such a mope, the work is all behindhand. All you do is to sit around, or walk around, as if you were in a dream. Are you billous, or los sick, or what?"

"You must judge for yourself, Aunt Debby," answered the girl, rather naughtily; for the natural sweetness of her (it) sition was a little source at times by the vine, as her aunt delighted to throw in it.

"Well, it looks a little like both. Sooms to make with night so fair as you used to be, and I shouldn't used if if yet took the Western fever. You'll have a good time should be you do, and be turned as yeller as a pumplin. And then again, the way you sigh, and the time you warra flain't have a flain't have who on arth it can be, is more than I can tall, I so it's that Siah White, that sneaks over here so often under the what of his sister Jerusha."

"Siah White, indeed!" murmare I Sasia, sa mility.

"I guess he's as good as you'll ever get, miss; so you needn't toss your head in that fashion. Who is it, then? You used to comb and brush your hair, and put it up in three minutes, so it would look as shiny as that bureau; and this afternoon you've been stan lin' at that looking-glass a fail hour. Do you expect anybody?"

"Not a single soul. I wasn't fixing my hair all that time, was I? I got looking into my own eyes, and thinking, I guess."

"Admirin' yourself, more like. The vanity and folly of young girls is surprising. Don't the 'postle Paul specially warn us against being light-minded and frivolous, and wearin' 'broidered hair?"

"What do you wear yours curled for, then, Aunt Debby?"

"The Lord curled my hair for me—I didn't do it myself; and since he's seen fit to make it grow so, 'tain't likely I'll fly in His face, as it were, by trying to straighten it out. Curls were always said to be very becoming to my style," and Debby cast a complacent glance in the little mirror which had been the means of entrapping Susie, that afternoon, into one of her day-dreams.

During this conversation, the two were in the front room, which was both their sleeping apartment and parlor; the door was open to the pale October sanshine, though the air was chilly enough to make the fire visible on the kitchen hearth, look particularly pleasant.

While Susie ripped apart the patchwork which she had put together so carclessly, and Debby gave her ringlets an extra twist, somebody shut the carden-gate, and the next moment the willow of Dan Sturgiss appeared at the open door. Her appearance caused a momentary pang of memory to shoot through Susie's mind.

"How d'ye do, Miss Stargiss? Walk right in," sail Debby. "I beven't seen you in some time! How'r you and the children?"

"We're better'n we've been in a long time," responded the will so, stepping in and taking a chair.

She was a little, care-marked body, who did not look as if she had ever seen very good times.

"How's Mr. Carter getting along? I see he's out."

"Father is about as well as he ever will be," answere! Su-san; "but I fear he will never have much strength of his own;" and her lip quivered.

"You don't tell! I'm right down sorry to hear it. Speaking of your father, puts me in mind of what I came over here to tell you. I will say, I wasn't never in my life much more taken aback than I was this very day. Who, of all folks, do you guess has been to see me?"

"For the Lord's sake, tell us to oncest," ejaculated Debby.

"It was my husband's murderer," said the widow, in a low voice.

" "I thought so," murmured Susic to herself.

Debby just dropped her knitting-work, and stared at their visitor.

"I'll tell you how it was," continued the latter. "I was out in the door-yard, pickin' up chips to boil the much for the children's dinner, when I heard a horse a-comin' along the road, and it stopped by our gate. I looked up, with my apron full of chips, and seen the hansomest young gentleman I've sot eyes on for years. It never came into my head who it was, for, you know, I'd never seen Mr. Gardiner myself, though he was to the house oneest, when I was out after the cow, he fore the trouble happened; and when the trid cane off I was sick a-bed, you mind.

"'Is this Mrs. Sturgies,' says he, very softly; and 'It is,' says I, dropping a courtesy; and then he kind of stepped a minit, and colored up, and after that, says he: 'I'm the man who killed your husband, Mrs. Sturgiss;' and at that I drapped all the chips out of my apron, and stood still all of a tremble. Of course I know the kind of feeling you must have farme," says he, 'and I don't seek to change it. I did not the at your husband until after he had fired at me. If I had not shot him down he would have murdered me. He was the atgressor; he came to my room to injure and discrete, if not kill me. But you knew all this habre. I came to yet be day to say that I am going back to New York to are, and I wish to ask your forgiveness, and to say to you that I regret the whole of this sel affair. I wish, alo, to pro- at you with a deal of this house, and the fifty acros of land y or husband had thee tin, and with two hundred dollars in many,

to help you and your orphans a little on your way through this hard world. Will you take them?' asked he, so 'umbly, reaching down the deed and the bag of gold; and I just took 'em, and burst out a cryin', and couldn't say a word; and, says he, 'God heep you, my poor woman,' and rode off, before I knew what I was about."

"Do you hear that, father?" asked Susan, almost joyfully; for Mr. Carter had come up to the door in time to hear the whole story.

As for Debby, she made no remark; she was thinking mournfully of that one sentence—"going to New York to-morrow."

"To be sure I heard it," was the gruff reply. "And what if I did? Will that give Miss Sturgiss her husband back? or will it give me the use of my good right arm again? One would think by the air you put on, you would like to tell me I desarved the hull of it. Seems to me it's strangely un lutiful for a girl that's been favore I as you have, to take part against her own father," and Mr. Carter sat down on the doorstep, and, after wiping his foreheld with a red silk hand-kerchief, covered it on his hand wearily.

"Oh, father, how you talk!" exclaimed Susie, the tears starting. He looked so pule and care-worn, as he sat there, she felt as it she could die for him, in her love and pity.

"Waal, you know it's so. Ever sine; the beginning of this usly business you've been against mae, trying to set up your judgment against mine. I'll tell you now what the doctor told me this mornin'. He said I'd never have no good use of my arm any more; it would serve me to wait upon myself, perhaps; but as for workin', my workin' days were over. What do you think of that, child? The land we've got is to be taken out from under our feet; we've nothing in the world to call our own, 'copt this little household trash; and if I had the hull carth for a farm, I couldn't work it. What are you going to do now for victuals to put in your mouth, so not I can never guide the plow, nor chop trees, nor hoe orn? I sip to you'll tell me I brought it all on mys lf, for my confort; but if I did, the Lord knows I was thinking of you when I done it."

"You break my heart, father," sobbel Sasie, stealing to his side on the step, and leaning her head on his shoulder; and there the long strain upon her feelings gave way, and she sobbed and shook with stormy grief.

Little Mrs. Sturgies cried from sympathy, while Delby joined in with an occasional groan.

"Lord-a-massy! what will become of us, sure enough!"

was the burden of her spoken thoughts.

By-and-by Susan raised her tear-stained face, shook back her disheveled hair, and spoke in a voice so fall of courage and resolution, that all looked up surprised:

"Don't be discouraged, dear father. You have worked for me for seventeen years, and now I will work for you."

"And what will you do, Susie?"

"I haven't had time to think what, yet; but I know I can do something; and I think it will make me happy to work for you. You know I'm a pretty good scholar, fither; puth is I can get up a school among our neighbors. And Aunt Debby can raise vegetables in the garden, and we can hire a man to put in enough grain for our own use, and we can live very well."

"You forget; neither house nor land is ours, till we've pail for 'em," said the farmer, moodily.

Susan's countenance fell, but she would not be discouraged.
"Then we must rent a place, that's all. It will be harder for us, but, father, I believe 'the Lord will provide.'"

"Humph!" broke out Aunt Debby; "you're a pretty person to be quotin' Scripter—a girl that's never made a prefession."

"Excuse me, aunty, for intruling upon your especial privilere," returned Susan, with a gleam of returning mirth.

"Oh, you're quite excusable. I'm glad to see you suising your dependence on divine grace;" and Debby clashed her knitting-needles—it may have been with joy, but it somethed as if it were with very Christian vexation.

"Well, neighbors, I must be going back to the children; they'll want their supper," said the willow, rising, and willing her eyes with the corner of her cape. "I fed as if the Levi had provided for me, and will continue to provide. And I've jest got to say that if you want for any thin' while the holds out, I trust you'll let me know."

"Thank you, Mrs. Sturges," replied Suma, with a bright smile; "as long as Aunt Debby and I keep well, there'll be no no need, I'm sure. Must you go? Then I'll go with you port of the way, for it's time I was boking up Sukey."

Although she was only going to the woods after the cow, Sum brashed her di trut heir, neatness being one of her crowning virtues. Then taking her san-bennet in her land, she walked along beside the willow, threugh a pleasant footpria, which took a short cut through the woods. When they came to the turn which took Mrs. Sturgiss in the direction of Ler own home, Sasie walked on abne. She scarcely remoralarel her crand, her mind was so fall of the new ileas and endions crowding into it. The forest path was strangely pleasant—she felt it, although it endy made her the more sal. The firsts of October had public half the laws from the ters, statering them in brilliant preferant along the way. The presents cur; is haid down for kings to tread upon are in in their way; but the rustling curpet of purply, groun, crims on, and gold, bill down by nature's loving lands, for our little queen of the West, was finer still.

The nersic which followed her footsteps despened her reverses; "the arrows of sinst were lodged in the tree-tops bright," and sine of them were translated in her gold-brown hair.

Herry Gerlin r, coming along from the opposite direction, saw her same times before she saw him. Raising her eyes, as she heart his top, he saw that she blushed; but the natural can the of meeting one who had given them so much trouble well have cared her heightened color, and he did not presume upon it.

"Miss Carter," he sail, as she returned his greeting, "I am chaing to my your father this evening."

"I do not think he will like it," answered the your girl, dr. that the some which she was afred howet follow upon the billet may be blicked as of her perent, more than she did the approach of radeness in reasing the young man's visit.

"I am air it he will not. Yet, when I feel that I wish to itself that is right to reach the matters between us, I must not fill to try. I have a depth very deep interest in making friends with your father, Miss Susan."

She made no reply, standing with downest eyes, picking off the crimson leaves from a map behough in har hand.

"I will only ask you one question before I see your father, Miss Carter; and that is, whether you have any prejudices which would not prevent our being friends?"

you and my father reconciled. I am not so blind but that I see he has been in the wrong. But, oh! he has been punished—too harshly;" and again the ready tears, whose fountains had been unsealed that day, rained over her Che hs.

"I have heard that he was likely to lose the tracef his right arm almost entirely; is it so?" a kell Harry, in rather on uncertain voice, for it moved him greatly to see these tears.

"It is too true. He is as helph s as he is por, Mr. Garliner." There seemed to be represent in her sail voice.

"Do not you judge me too severely? You must, you shall forgive me all the pain I have caused you," exclained Harry, impetuously. "Whether I am permitted to or not, I shall call on your father to-night. To-morrow I so away, and I can not go without taying what is in my heart."

He touched his hat and walke I on. So on would be regotten Suk y, but the pretty red cow did not fore ther; she came out of the wood, lowing cently, and followed her mistress home. An exalted sense, as if she were withing with wings, accompanied Sasan, as she performed the kundly household dutes of the evening, for she felt what the errand of the young man must be—no girl is blind or deaf to the evidences of love. Yet she did not dure to tell her faller who she expected, but sat, with her knitting, before the illusing wood fire, after the work was done, talking with Acut Day'y about small matters, as if the innocent heart within was not all in the wildest tumult. Shortly after the can be was lighted, she heard the gate close, and a step approaching.

"That sounds like the doctor's walk," said Mr. Carer; "I don't know what he's comin' here any more for, "I saids to present his till; and where's the mency to came from for fig., Sister Debby?"

Trembling in every limb, Soun hastened to open the lear, for she did not wish her father to go to it, for the leave of shut it in his visitor's face. When Mr. Carters award it was he arose from his chair. Aunt Debby gave a slight scream, and buried her blushing face in her hands. The memory of the prison scene was vivid before her; could it be possible he had repretted his refusal of her hand, and had e are to signify his intention of accepting it?

"Good-evening, Mr. Carter," said the young man, stepping in.
"I have no good-evening for you, sir," was the stern reply.

"At least you will let me speak to you a moment on business?" There was no answer, and he continued: "I hear that the unfortunate accident which you brought upon yourself, sir (it was too true, and Harry was not the man to shrink from the truth), has disabled you for life. Although I will not acknowledge the least blame in that sad accident, I regret it none the hes keenly. I am sincerely sorry and grieved. I wish to say that you will never be disturbed in the ownership of this firm, her called upon to return to me any thing I have paid for it. It is yours."

"I refers to take it," burst forth the sull in squatter; "I will I is it is of him or before I will live on any thing your charity may sock to give me. You can't patronize me, sir—no, sir! I'm an honest man; I've carned my bread by the sweat of my brow, and I won't have any airs put on by you."

"O brother! don't be so cru-hard," pleaded Debby, casting a sighing glance toward the young gentleman. "He means the last; and I'm sure I think him very generous, and so-ho-nice and forgiving." This was a bling fact to the squatter's wrath.

"Don't think I shall trouble your land only till I get well enough to move off of it, sir. And another thing, if you halln't known I was powerless to kick you out o'doors, you wouldn't 'ave come in my house after what has parted between us."

The young man grew pale with anger, and turned upon his heel to go, when a glimpse of the white, imploring face of the daughter softened his resentment so much, that he forced himself to speak again: "You may speak as you please, now, Mr. Carer, since you know I will not touch a help's a man. I am sorry that you will not let me be friendly—will not let me assist you, not as a patron, but as a friend—a son," he alled, with a glance at Susan. "Good-by, Miss D borah; I shall always remember you. Good-by, Susan," helling out his hand, which she did not refuse; and, as he pressed it, he whispered, "My errand is all undone; but I shall come again."

A new thought crept through the farmer's brain as he saw the lingering look which passed between his daughter and the man he hated. It was a thought which gave him very disagreeable reflections.

Mr. Carter was one of those men, generally kind and goolnatured, yet of a stubborn make, who, when they have ense taken an ill-will, are very slow to give it up. He was more proud than he was generous—too proud to accept favors from his enemy, and not generous enough to acknowledge hims hi in the wrong. In his secret soul he knew that he had brought his misfortune on himself, but this knowledge was no healing balm to a temperament like his; it only mode him chaft the more at the ugly fact. Could it be possible that his daughter dured to love that insolent young fellow, whom he had be Was that all the respect she had for her own father? Chewing the cud of these bitter fancies, he remained in silence the rest of that gloomy evening.

Sasan stole off to her bed to weep half the night, and D beby, as she knitted away at her stocking, heavel a sigh with every round, wondering if the young gentleman had not meant "brother" instead of "son," and thinking how very hard it was, at her age, to meet with "another disup intment."

A few days later, when Mr. Carter learned that his doctor's bill had been paid, and the land he occupied deckel to him, and the decks left with Mr. Gardiner's lawyer, he showed no signs of relenting; and Susan, studying his face carerly, turned from it with a great sigh.

"You may just make up your mind, sister, that we'll make into another State this full," was his decision.

CHAPTER VI.

THE BALL.

There was going to be a ball at Giles' Tavern. Hearts may have ached with despair that not even the tender of twenty dollars could squeeze into the Japanese Ball, and hearts may beat high with pride that took part in the sixty-thousand dollar ball to the Prince of Wales-but a regular western break-down is worth three of either of the above. No heartburnings at not being invited -no terrible fear of not knowing who is whe, and not much distress about having "nothing to wear." For every girl is bound to go, and enjoy herself, if she has to wear her every-day called frock, and put a string of relberris around her neck for ornament; and as for the se-I the of the company, if she's asked to dance often eneigh, by the bear she likes best, she has no other anxiety. And for the power of relishing amusement, there's nothing letter to cell it forth, than a year's residence in a new country. Work gives a z st to play. Every human being within twenty miles is a telelibor and friend. Everybody borrows and lends—take Greefer in other in siekness, and help each other when hardpressed.

The bill at Giles' tavern was coing to be a splendid affair. The bill room was a long, low room, running the whole length of the Louis across the front of the upper story. The walls and ciling were plastered, but not white-washed. The brave of the young wolverines of the vicinity, spent a week in a tring out evergreens and festooning this state apartment. There was to be a liberal allowance of the best tallow can his, and the tin sockets in which those were to be placed, and which were nailed at regular intervals in a line around the room—two rows over the musician's platform, were circled to his with a fistive wreath. The four windows in front were similarly a lorned, and a large gurland formed the cornice around the ceiling.

While the young men were busy with the decorations above, the landlady and her pretty daughter Kitty, were equally busy in their department. The immense numbers of crosswhich went into pound-cake, and loaf cake, and frosting and less their, and jumbles, and trifles, and vanities, and hearts, and rines, was almost incredible. If the fowls who checked so proceeduly in the back-yard, could have dreamed of it, or of their own coming doom, they would have slept no more apon their downy roosts.

But oh, oh, what were they to do for minee-pies? Minpies! a ball would not be a ball without that article of hixury to grace the feast-and apples were yet not grown in the new country. Kitty suggested dried-apples, and the result; after all her patient chopping, and flavoring, and laking, was triumphant. "Nobaly woull'nt know the dill' rune," Mrs. Giles was sure. Chicken to be stewel, rostel, and fril; turkey (wild turkey at that) to be roa ted and bill; venison to be baked in a pie, and bakel in a dripping in; qualls to be roasted and broiled, and-"Oh, mother, I dia't so how I'm ever to get dressed and have my share of the denting, and so much to be done at the last minute," qual, Kitty, halfcrying, in the morning of the day. "Never you mind that," answered the motherly Mrs. Glies, "you've been a good will, and helped meramazingly. Just as soon as the class singly four, you can clear out and 'tend to yours li. Deby Cater, though she's a member, and dead opposed to bulls, has prome ised to come over at dark and help me all night." Now no der Kitty flew around in such high spirits. A g-1, d-p fill of snow the previous night, had brought the first slight; the house would be sure to be crowded to over-running and oh, dear! hadn't they got a filller all the way from Pather. that was said to play faster and better, than any man in the State? and hadn't her mother been so pleased with her skill in making tritles, and powdering, and sugaring cakes, and her industry in carrying on the work, that she'd surprised her with a wreath of artificial roses with silver leaves, to war ar and her head, and a new pair of pink kill slippers? No walls Kitty's cheeks were rel, and her feet light and quick. That was a day of pleasant expectation to every girl within a large circle of miles. Many were the dr. ses in med out, the eldernaments looked over, the tucks let down, the new frocks hastily faished. By noon, those who have far to ride, begin to attire themselves in their finery; and by five o'clock, great sleighloads of marry youths and mailens, are dashing up to the tavern door.

On his merry afternoon, let us look in the front room of Carter's cabin, where Susan, heretofore the belle of every frolic, sits illy by the bright fire. No gay dress is spread out on the bed, and her fingers are busy with no ril bons nor wreaths. She sits, during into the fire, thinking—sally thinking. She's White he begged and implored of her for days, to do him the fivor to alow him to wait upon her to the ball. But she has wavel, and finally decidedly declined.

Peor Sis in his son nothing but trouble for the last two months. Her father, once so cheery and hearty, is fretfal and "put-out" about nothing. Grown strangely unreasonable, he had insisted on their getting ready for another removal, going without mans, in the fall of the year, away from all friend who mighthave aided them, himself unable to work, farther into the wills of the West. Neither Debby's remonstrance nor Sami's plading, had any influence, and they had actually into park up their goods to go, they knew not where, when Mr. Carter was taken down with a violent attack of fever-and type, while positively compelled him to give up his absurd intention for the present.

Sick every other day, and mostly all the time, he tried the patines of his devoted child severely. As for Debby, she creard and marmurel; relieving her mind occasionally by living her brother a good seedling, and making Sasie the scapegoat of all her lesser trials.

her ther sail they had enough to keep them for the winter, and he wanted her to nur e him up, and he would not hear to her tking the step at present.

In he mean time, the dissatisfaction of the squaters was increasing at dia; Mr. Garliner's hawyer had attempted to got let's me rent from them, for the lands they occupied; they had read to pay it; shift were in process; threats and quarrols use at road; the lawyer had warned his client not to think dishowing himself in person at present anywhere in the neighbrhood.

All these things weighed upon the heart of Susan. Her futher's disturbed mind and poor health; their gloomy prospects for the future, and something else, perhaps, more representations that the rest. She did not feel like going to any firstly; and there she sat, that brilliant winter afternoon, hould the musical bells tinkling past the door, with the merry should and laughter of young people singing on the air.

She was started from her reverie by hearing their own component open and close, and some one tapping at the door. She open if it with reluctance, for she surmised that 'Siah White was coming to renew his entreaties. But there only stood there a little boy, a neighbor's child, who lived near the tavera helding a note in one mittened hand, and rubbing his related with the other.

"It's for Miss Susan Carter herself, and nobody cle," said the little fellow, "as he give me a sixpence for bringn' it—} you her?"

"Yes, I'm the one it is meant for. Won't you can in and warm yourself?"

"I ain't cold," said the boy, half-scornfully, and he harded off, making snow-balls as he ran, while Susan shut the door, and read the note.

We cannot tell you its contents, for she threw it in the fire immediately, but a charge of electricity could not have 1 full-check her up any more. Going immediately to that up a slower drawer of the bureau, she unlocked it, and 1 maght full-her mother's welding-dress, the gold-heads, the silver-there scarf, the kid slippers, the open-worked stockings, the tip searf, the kid slippers, the open-worked stockings, the tip searf, the backed comb. As she was spreading all this flary out upon the bed, Debby came in from the kitch in "How now; what's this? Made up your mind to said the last minute. It's jest like you, Susan; but I'm nath relation've concluded to go, for I was afraid you'd make a nath enemy of 'Slah. Girls shouldn't throw away their class quite so free. 'Slah's a good fellow, and you'd a sight to remarry him than go to school-teachin' for a livin'. She alive! you don't intend to wear that dress, do you'r You ought to save that for your own wedding-dress."

"I haven't time to do up my white mull now, and it we had be fit to wear without. I now wear thin, Aunt Delby."

"Wall, I must say your gettin' rather extravagant, considerin' our circumstances. But I 'spose you'll never be young twice, in this world. If you're going, I must put your father's supper on the table before I start. You know I'm goin' to halp Miss Giles. Of course I don't approve of balls, but since it's got to be, I can't refuse to help a neighbor, and there's no girls to be had near or far. I shall hear the music and get some of the supper."

"If you won't cat the devil, you'll drink his broth," observed Mr. Carter, out of the kitchen.

"Oh, he ther! what a man you are. Hurry yourself, Suran, and he ready for me to fasten your dress, when I've done settin' the table. I do won ler what I'd better wear myself. I'd put on my green merino, if I was'nt afraid of grease-spots. I say help to wait on table, and if I should, of course I'd wish to appear respectable. I guess I'll put it on, and keep on a big apron about the cookin'."

It was not an hour after this that the sleigh which was to the for the all-important Debby, who knew so well how to "take hold" and assist Mrs. Gles, was at the door; and she sat I hers If in it, with a large basket at her feet, designed to hold such choice remnants of the feest as might fall to her in I symmat of her neighborly services in the time of need.

Perhaps another hour from this, Sasan entered the junty little cut r which stopped for her, and with a dark skirt over the won brill silk dress to keep it from soiling during the ride, and a variable ak wrapped about her, was curefully tucked in a belieb robe, and rapidly driven to the grand scene of the fistivities.

In file a minutes there fler, she was standing at the head of the ball-room, opposite her partner, her little for patting the flor expectantly, while the fillders room 1 their bows, and timed up their filldes for the next contra-dance.

No wender her checks were flushed with pleasure and hope, if rish was, without dispute, the prettiest dressed and prettiest looking maid not the ball. The rare broadle was of a delicate II as shale, emboded with white flowers, which no complexion save one as dazzlinely fair as hers should have ventured to wear. It flued her round, trim waist to perfection. There was a dainty edging of lace about the bolom and sleeves, and around the waist was fastened the sash of silver tissue finished with silver fringe. Her hair was elaborately braided behind, and fastened with the tortois shell-c mb; in front it was smoothed into glossy banks, in which was placed, at the left side, a single sprig of searlet geranium which had blossomed on purpose for the occasion in the warm air of the snug kitchen. Around her throat was the string of gold beals; and on her little feet a pair of blue kid slippers, not very far amiss from the tint of her dress. This was the extremely cirgant and astonishing attire of the wolverine belle, which care t so many admiring and some cuvious eyes to be fixed up a l. r.

Great was the wrath and mortification of Sich White, when he beheld this lovely and dazzling vision. Sasan Carter, sad, pale, and wee-begone, had refased only the evening before, for the seventeenth time, to go to the ball with him, or any one, and here she was, brilliant with blushes, sailes and happiness; her checks like roses, her eyes like stars, star liter at the head of the room, ready to lead off the ball with a pantner whom no one of the company ren, inhere I sais glasses. Her partner was a tall, straight, young fellow, with a very link complexion, and long hair tangled about his needs, which is connection with his decidedly welverine dies, halding r. ladidamer, gave him a rustic appearance. He were better. the true country style, and flourished a yellow silk had harchief. But he danced with a grace and a will. Shih White sat moodily through a whole dance, watching the gay pair, down the outside, and up the middle, balance, and rought at and down, the heels of his rival coming down exactly tractor time, with a thump that was exhibarating, and Sasan's pritter feet keeping up the measure as sweet as playing a tit.

If Josich had been a high-minded young man, he well have kept his jealousy and ander to himself; but hing of rather a mean and narrow mature, he went about and har his fellows, complaining of Susan's treatment, and trying to hall is them to help him resent his wrongs. But they could not alford it. Susan was too beautiful, and danced too well. Its ry youth who could get her for a partner was only too gill to do so. She accepted as many as she could, only dancing with her own especial escort, twice before supper; and livalent. himself agreeable to the girls, Susan introducing him to the maidens of her acquaintance.

The supper was a triumph of art and nature. Two long tables were set in the dining-room, around which the ladies were set of an woolen benches, their partners standing I shind them with devoted attention, their own appetites I ingolf red until the fair ones shall have banqueted, and left a I'see for them. Here were pies—pumpkin and mines—pickles and choose, butter and stewed cramberry sauce, and cakes immunerable and indescribable, all arranged by the testeful hands of Kitty Giles—sprigs of spruce stuck in the butter, gorlands of hemlock twisted about the loaf-cake, white sugar grated over the pies, and one noble pyramid of poundeake clerally decorated with pop-eern stuck familially to the fresting, and also on the green wreath which circled its less.

Every thing was a limited, and every thing caten. The way country young people dance, beginning at six in the evening, and keeping it up till five in the merning, to the fastest time the filldles can give forth, is an excell at thing to provoke up tite. The means were on side-tables; and very abundant and very delicious these were. Powls, wild and tame, venison and birds were in the utmost profusion.

Miss Debby Carter made herself very weful waiting upon table. The green merino and "raving ringlets" flacked everywhere. Sus in could see that she was dying to ask her about her unknown e cort, but the crowded state of the table allowed of no confidential whispering. When Susan had left her place to her companion, and was awaiting with others, the reapparance of the gentlemen from the fact, Daby pounced upon her in a solitary moment.

"Liw-a m. y, Sa in Carter, who is it you've got there, and where d'I he come from. I he rd about him long he fore supper. Jerusha came down to the kitchen and told me how you'd saved her brother. I thought maybe it was somehely I he w, on from the Bast unexpectedly, or somethin'; so I stay apost his slyly, and stood watchin' you a long time. I must say it's queer you've picked up a beau, nobody knows where, how, or who. What's his name?"

"Aunt Deborah, allow me to present Mr. Taylor to you.
Miss Carter, Mr. Taylor."

The stranger had come up, unobserved by her, during Delby's speech, and Susan now introduced him, without any chance for explanations. He made a deep low, but did not speak. As she met those dark, smiling eyes, the spinster almost screamed. The next moment, she press it is reliable hard against her heart, and taking a second carnest chance, the look of alarm gave place to one of perplexity, and she remarked:

"Excuse my sceming a sitution, Mr. Taylor. You remind a me so much of a very, very dear friend. It's out as -but indeed, I see my mistake."

"Since I resemble your friend so much, p'raps 'twill be in my favor—kinder incline you to think suthin' of me, to."

replied the youth.

"Perhaps it will," responded the spinster, with a sigh. "He was a very sweet person, the one you look like, and I was very much attached to him, and him to me."

"If you only danced, Miss Carter, I should be mighty girl of the favor of your company. Wouldn't you now, jet i r my sake."

"La, Mr. Taylor, I'm greatly obliged to you; but I couldn't think of it. I regard it as wrong, and besides I'm a member, and then folks would make remarks, and like as not I'd put churched."

"Indiced? I'd set great store on leading off a Virginity reel with you. Your niece has been tellin't me what a than the days but a your young—in the days but it requires became a professor."

"I expect I did wear out about as many pair of Piperson any girl. And, though I say it that shouldn't, it has been said I was a tot note hand to wind out that Virginity in h. It I thought nobody'd tell my minister when he can said a most church-members think—I don't know—but I mid ht—jest this once. But la! I've got on my call skin should.

"Never mind that, Miss Carter. I've taken a great not in to dance with you. There! the filliers are done supported let's go up, and get a place at the head of the keep."

Poor Debby! she was sorely tempted; that will illimited "got into her feet," and she felt so that red by the principle ing solicitations of the strange youth—but to the credit of her consistency be it related that she consciutionally ref. 1), the ing from temptation to the dining-room, where she and Mrs. Giles now set down in a snug corner and waited upon themselves to the supper.

The first ball of the season was a grand success. It did not break up until daylight. Susan danced the very last break-down, looking only a little less rosy and fresh them in the beginning. Then, tired, joyous, cluted with the triumph of being the balls of the ball, and having been asked every set, she was lifted into the cutter, and driven home in the gray of the morning.

Her father was up, raking out the great bed of hickory coals from the covered fire, when she went in. He looked as if he had not slept well, and complained of a pain in his arm.

A shadow crept over Sasan's brightness, which all the fatigue of the ball could not bring there; she kissed him, and looked at him wistfully, as if her lips trembled to say something which yet they had not the courage to do.

"Go and get a good nap, child," he said. "I'll make the coffee myself this morning."

"Indeed, I'm not sleepy yet. Whit till I get off these fine things, and I'll get the breakfast."

"Fine things, indeed, for a beggar to be wearing," quoth the melancholy squatter. "You may have to sell your mather's weddin'-dress yet, to keep starvation out of the house. I wish we'd stayed to home, where we belonged, and never came to this new country."

CHAPTER VII.

THE LYNCHERS AGAIN.

About a week after the ball, there began three days of extreme cold weather, when the most the squatters in their energing cabins could do, was to keep warm, pile on the history logs as they might in the great fireplaces. These who had a good store of wood already chopped, had nothing to do but bring it in, pile it up, and sit and enjoy the crackling the equilibring it was a season when farmers had little to do, equilibring the energial three mew beginners, who had but little stock to feed and earlier for. There who had been too carelies to provide for in zing weather, had fingers and toes nipped by the iny air, as they tugged the logs out of the wood, and split them up in the snowy door-yards.

It was a desolate time at the cubin of Encs Carter. His wounded arm had prevented him from getting out any fir wood at all in the autumn; they had been burning so has had chanced to be in the forest round about, Sis an and Dibby themselves tagging the mest of it home; but now the snow by frezen over all, and the big less in the part were all burned up. Some time before the ball Sich White L. I come over and spent a whole day handing and splitting well for them; but this supply was gone, and Sich was now is "mad as a hornet," as he told his sister Jerusha, and well his lave cut a stick of firewood for Sasan, to keep her prints fingers from freezing. Mr. Carter hall no many to him a man; their money was all gone, and they were running to an account at the only grocery in those parts for their calfee and ten, and expecting every week when their credit their would be gone.

"I'll have my ager back on me wuss than ever, if you can't keep up a better fire than this, Susan." Poor child! she had come in almost frozen, with the few raicks she could dig out of the snow, and this was all her reward—she felt discouraged.

"It's no use, fither, trying to get along in this way; I must go to the tavern and get somebody to farnish us with wood. Maybe I can sell my gold beads to Kitty Giles; her father's doing a splen if I but incos, and he could afford to let her have them. The money they would bring would keep us comfortably until spring."

"They were your mother's, Susan—but you can do as you please."

The young girl tied on her hool, fastened her cloak snugly at her, and, cold as it was, started on her two mile walk, with the precious necklice claped close in her hands.

she went forth pale and disheartenel; she returned bright and happy, despite of the bitter cold. She had not sold the locals; but not an hour had clapsed after her return, before a light deficience hickory was thrown into the back-yard; and after the tenn ter had driven away, along came the identical Mr. Taylor, who had escorted Sman to the party, and who fill to splitting and pling up the local with the vicer of youth and strength.

"Waal, I must say that chap takes a great int rest on short acquaintance," remarked Aunt Dabby.

"He heard me inquiring for some one to do that job, and, as there was no man about the town who could be spared, he said it was to cold weather for people to be without good firs; and, as he was tired of standing around and doing nothing he would come and take some exercise on our wood; its," answered Susan, laughing.

"R dly, a kind and pleasant fellow. How did you come to pick up his acquaintance, Susan?" asked her father—people in the weals of the West not being so scrupulous as to letters of introduction, and satisfactory testimonials, as in more civilized communities.

"ha!" answered Debby for her, "he took her to the ball.
It seems he was a stopping at the tavern, and hearin' there was a ball comin' off, he told Giles he'd like to wait on some pretty girl, and Gile, seein' he was a nice young fellow, ont him to Susan."

"You ought to ask him in to take supper when it's really." "I will, father."

So Susan, who had been pretending to knit, while her eyes were all the time on the youth who swung his ax so skillicity in the yard, ran out and held a brief conversation with him, while Debby put on an extra plate, and dished up the meal.

"He says he can't stop to-night," said Susan, returning without him; "but maybe he will come in to-morrow, for he's coming back in the morning to finish all that wood,"

Susan milke I the cow, while Debby washed the dishes.

It was a bright moonlight night, and when the work was "done up," Debby avowed her intention of going over to Mrs. Sturgiss' to get some yeast-cakes, to start a new pet of yeast, as hers had "run out." Tying her face up in a work neonaforer, drawing a pair of old socks over her shoes, and otherwise defending herself from the frost, she departed, leaving Mr. Carter and Susan sitting by the kitchen fire.

The checrful, vivid warmth and glow flashing from the large fireplace, warmed the squatter through and through, and seemed to soften his feelings, as well as ease his joints, in a more genial expression came over his face than had been therefor some time. Susan, furtively watching him, while her knitting needles flashed in the ruddy light, at lest area, put aside her work, drew a small cricket to his fiet, and a sing herself thereon, leaned her head upon his know.

"Father!" in a low, tremulous voice.

"Well, my dear?"

"Father, you are discouraged and poor. I can so cyry day that you get thin with this care and werry. Yet can change it all, if you only will, dear father; you can be lover off than you have ever been. I have heard from Harry Gardiner. He loves me, father, and wants your constitutionary ry me."

The silence which followed upon this avowal somed to the young girl to be that of an hour, yet it was not over a minute before the father spoke:

"Sasan Carter, you can choose between me and Mr. Gardiner. If you want that scoundred, go to him! As in him and me—we can never be relations."

"I can not forsake you, father; but I love Mr. Gardiner, and I think you are very unjust to him, and cruel to me."

"Enough! Things has come to a pretty pass, when a child like you talks to her father about his conduct, and sets up to teach him the right and the wrong. I tell you, girl, I'd rather be as poor as Job's turkey all my life, than to own the biggest farm in Michigan, and see you married to that fellow."

"Well, father, I have nothing more to say."

The hopeless, quiet tone touched him to the heart, for this only child was the i lol of his life; but he had formed a foolish aversion, and he was too obstinate to yield, even for the sake of what he had always made the object of his exertions—Sasun's happiness. His self-love was deeply wounded by the fact that she should have the independence to judge and act contrary to his wishes. He was one of those who believed that children should be the slaves of their parents until they were of age—having no minds nor opinions of their own.

"See here, Susan," he said, after a half-hour of silence, "'pears to me there's somethin' curiously alike in that Mr. Taylor that was here this afternoon, and that Gardiner. Don't you go to playin' tricks on me. I'll shut you up in the cellar, and keep you there, if you can't be kept away from that rascal without. And let me tell you, it'll be more dangerous than ever for him to come creeping about here. If the neighbors find it out, they'll make sure work this time. If I find out my suspicions are true, you needn't reckon on my keepin' still."

"O father!" Susan resumed her knitting with a look of pa'n and grave reproach upon her young face.

Presently some one knocked at the door. Mr. Carter went to it, and, as it opened, he saw Josiah White, and two or three others outside; they beckened to Mr. Carter to come out, and stood whispering for a brief time; then the former came in and got his hat and comforter.

"It's all up with him, now," he said, savagely; "they've got him."

Who?" cried S sam, rising to her feet, her eyes dilating, so that her father could not bear their frightened, terrible look.

"That fool, Gardiner," he replied, dozzedly, not meeting her gaze; "and I'm goin' to see the fun. They've found out the wolf in the lamb's skin, and they'll strip it off of him protty effectually, I reckon."

"Pather, you'll kill me," screamed the girl, as he went out, banging the door behind him.

A short time she stood staring after him; then springing to the door, she saw the men were taking the direction of Glass' tavern. The night was intensely cold and brilliant; the bound of the full moon reflected from the sparkling surface of the frozen snow, making it nearly as light as day. Stretching her punting throut to listen, she heard distant yells and ories; the men were running, as if afraid they should be too late for the sport. Pausing not for hood or clock, Susan started after them; and when Aunt Debby returned shortly after, she found the door wide open, the inmates gone, and the house "as call as a barn." Too much taken up with their own excitonent to notice the light figure which fled after them, the nan passed on.

Half-way between Carter's and the tavern, there was one of those deep ponds or lakes, which dotted the country round about. It was a little back from the road-ide, in a large, of an piece of ground. As they neared this pond, Susan saw a crowd collected about it, hooting and yelling like so many devils. She comprehended their purpose at once. Her father and his companions turned off the road, and ran to join in the made. Thoughtless of the consequences to herself, Susan pursued.

The ice over the surface of the pond was froz n to the depth of a foot and a half; but out a roll or two from the shore they had cut a hole, and, standing by the sile of it, held by half a dozen persons, his arms tightly pinion. I to his sile, his face white in the moonlight, but his lips still wreated with a haughty smile, she saw her lover. She thought they intended to drown him at once; whereas, their offit was, probably, no more devilish than to give him a dozen good duckings in the bitter cold water, and let him live or all through it, as he saw best. Even as she gazed, they life I him off his feet. No one had discovered her, though she was actually in the crowd; till, with a will shrick, she dured put them, and clasped her arms about the form they were handling so roughly. Tight as the drowning of specific this if was the hold she fixed about him, her face in his bosom, and her hair glittering in the moonlight, di heveled by her flight.

"Susan, is this you?"

She did not answer him; she only felt that she should die with him, or save him by the clinging tenacity of her hold.

"Oh ho!" "whom have we here?" "love-sick!" "Carter's drught r, by Julis!" were a few of the exclamations of the dozen or two of men concerned in this outrage; "ah, ha!" "did you ever?"

"Duck 'em both!" sneered Josiah White, maddened at this spectacle, so that what little manhood there was in him was driven out.

"Mr. Carter, what do you say to that?" joined another.

"Take the knife from my pocket and cut the rope," whispered Harry, in Susan's car.

"Come, Carter, take your daughter off; we can't be kept waitin' in this style."

Mr. Carter laid his heavy hand on his child's shoulder; his feet was awful with rage and mortification; she wilted in his grasp as if he had crushed a flower, but that momentary deliv hals ived her lover; she had cut the bands which held his arms, and as her father drugged her back, he flying his aras sail ply wile open, and, shaking off the unprepared hands which held him, with a ringing whoop gave one bound ov r the hele-away, away over the glittering ice, and surefor lasad r. His pursuers were none of them his ounds in the rank. All stort I on the run except Mr. Carter. When Les aw the prior retart, he thing Stan from him with a firethat sort her to the ground. They were now about too ther, and without aging a word to her, he turned on his hel and strole off in the direction of his addin. The girl rest from the snow, and followed him home; but as she reached the the shall, she fill over it insentible. Debby picked her up and post her to bed, spending the might in raiding her with vin gar, and giving har bim thating drinks.

That same night the willow Stargles was found from her first shoulders by a knock at her door. Thinking some of the anight remark sick, she slipped on her gown, and opening the deep, build Mr. Gardiner standing there, half prished with cold and fatigue.

"They came pretty near ducking me in the pond this freezing night," he said; "but I have outwitted them again. You won't refuse a fellow-creature a shelter, this weather, will you, Mrs. Sturgiss?"

"Not you, Mr. Gardiner," answered the woman; "c me right in to the fire. I haven't any bed to offer you, 'less you'll sleep with the children."

"I don't want a bed. I'll rake up the fire, and put on another big stick, and if you've any thing to give me for a pillow, I'll lay down on the hearth and rest a little."

The widow couldn't rest till she had warmed up some coll coffee, and made him eat a piece of pumpkin pie; and then giving him a quilt to wrap up in, she went back to bed in her gown, and she and her guest both slept as peacefully as if the circumstances in which they were placed were not so novel.

The next morning Harry breakfasted in a friently mann r with the little widow and her shy brood, and as soon the reafter as she could get away, Mrs. Sturgiss started for the Carter's, ostensibly for the purpose of carrying some of her yeast-cakes, which she had promised to Debby, and really to whisper a message in Susan's ear, asking her to come over to the willow's and meet somebody, who wanted to have a talk with her very much. But when the woman arrived at the cabin, she found Susan ill in bed, and quite unable to fulfill the regrest. The girl's cheeks were flushed with fever; she was a received and startled at every noise. But after the whisper reached her that Harry Gardiner was safe in the willow's horse, and wanted to see her, she grew more composed.

"Tell him it's only a headache, and maybe I can have him there to-morrow," she whispered.

Neither she nor Debby would betray that there was a formentation of hops and vinegar over the great bruise in her sile, where her rude father had dashed her against one of the cales of ice out from the pond, for which he now falt heartly grieved and ashamed.

Jealousy has sharp eyes. 'Siah White, though not remarkable for his powers of observation, by dint of hanging about the tayern, watching every word and motion, and prying into the affairs of the stranger who had rivaled him in Seem's graces, had at length made the important discovery that he was Harry Gardiner in disguise. Gloating over this chance for revenge, he had made the fact known to a band of the worst of the squatters, who had surprised their enemy, taking him totally unawards, as he was out alone on the road, and were hastening to put their intentions into execution, before the people of the tayern rallied for his defence. Once more he had thwarted them; but now, it may be supposed, his patience was exhausted, and his orders to his lawyer to exercise the greatest bull key were with leavn. The squatters had shown a ditermination to get themselves into trouble; and now, as they had made their bed, so they might lie in it.

As for Harry, he disappeared from the inhospitable country. See an was confined to her bed for a fortnight, and to the house a fortnight longer. Her father made amends for his britality, by a kindness he had not shown to her for some time. But Debby was cross; and Debby had learned that the man who "had given her the mitten," had offered his hand and heart to that chit of a niece.

"If you'd a but one spark of pride or proper folin', you'd never have allowed him to speak to you, Sasan Carter. A in an that's disabled your father for lifes why I, who am only his sister, wouldn't have him if he'd beg on his knees for me. It's my 'pinion, too, that he's a reglar flirt. You'd best look out. I guessit's well your father drove him off. If you'd know what I know, about what passed between him and some being closed wo man state time he was in prison, you wouldn't to much store by what he promies. Some body I know give him the mitten, out and out, with the u'most in lightly. If you had proper spank, you wouldn't take up with other people's havin's; but I me da't warn you now; he's gone for good, thank the hord?' and Dobby sighed strangely loud, considering the nature of her rejoicing.

CHAPTER VIII.

THE SUGAR CAMP.

Two or three times during Susan's sickness, Mrs. Sturgiss had delivered into her hands, secretly, little missives, which she read and re-read, unseen by others, and kept in the bosom of her night-dress, until they were fairly worn out. Debby's healing-art, great though it was, had nothing like the power of restoration which lurked in these bits of following er.

They were equal to any of the charms of fibled sorcerers.

After her recovery, she made an errand to Mrs. Story's house, as often as once in a week; and seldom did shows there, but that good woman to 4k down from the high stole in her cupboard a similar missive, which she had belief there is safe-keeping until called for.

"Folks begins to won ler at my gettin' a letter every week," she remarked, upon one such occasion. "The perturber to the grocery store, asked me, yesterday, if any of my filends was sick, that they was a writin' so reglar. I didn't heally know what to say, for I didn't want to tell a libright outbut you are sick, you know, or was a spell ago, and so I said, 'my friend had been very sick, but was a gettin' but r.'"

"You won't have to call for letters much longer, I hap ," answered Susan, who had turned her face to the window to conceal the blushes and smiles with which she perus dather hand.

Just then, and unexpectedly to Sasan, who had I is her at home, sewing carpet-rags together, Debby pared the window, looking in with a sharp, inquiring then to She saw the letter very plainly, and she saw her nime's confusion, as she cared a moment later, but she could get no further clinger of that which had excited her curiosity, it having be a heatily three into somebody's bosom. Debby asked to horrow a sleen of black thread till she could send to the store; but the thread was only an excuse—she had surmised some motive in the sullen film Iship which had sprung up between the little willow and her niece,—besides, 'Slah White had told her Mrs. Starples was getting letters from the office every week, and he didn't believe they were for her.'

Getting the skein of thread, Debby deported; and the next time Susan was away from the house, she took the opportunity of overhauling her private drawer, from which, laid away under the silk dress, she drew a package of love-letters, which it made her heart burn to read.

From that time forward, all unsuspected by their own r, she read every missive that was only laid aside in the package when a new one came to take its place in the folds of Sasan's dress-waist. In this manner she knew all the hopes and fears, the wishes and plans of the lovers, keeping her own come I and betraying them to no one.

Spring came early after the severe winter. The violets I can to bloom in March. Before it was time to plow or low, came the searon for making maple-sagar. Frolics occurred on many of the farms. It was considered fine sport by the boys and girls to make sugar, and as a great deal of the comfort of the new country depended on this crop, they were permitted to go into it with all their might and main. Sagar-maples were abundant on some of the land, and most of the sporters got sagar and molasses enough to last them the year round.

Mr. Carter wouldn't make any because he was going to move away. But Susan went to a good many frolics. She had recovered her spirits, so that her sweet beigh and bright eyes were welcome wherever she went.

Willow Stargiss had a fine maple orchard on her place; she was bound that her little ones should not go without their share of the "swe is of existence," so she begget a trough here, and a back a there, and plugged the trees herself, and Sison and D bloy assisted her to empty the sap as fact as it fill I, keep up the fires, and skian the syrap. Finally, they can ball to have more a sistence; the boys and cirls were all to a fiblic, and joyfolly responded to the call. They can in the morning, in their everyday after, to work, really tor any emergen is, what a rait should be to tear their frocks on the brish specific team with molasses.

All day the work went on in the depths of the plants woods. They were furnished with a lanch and a night roatof-doors.

As night stole over the force, Stern, who was tall of the written postry, a lmired the will picture pun of the six The light of the two grat firs thashel after into the my vista. making the outer darkness the more appelling. The faces which flitted about the fires, stirring the cont n's of the great iron kettles, now seemed to her like witch a simination the ing caldron; and again, as merry laught r butter out it as one and another, like the gip ies of old English is a tall as ing around their evening meal.

Something was on her min I, however, which keet ler L. dwelling long on any funcy. She was un-cy at the ajprouch of a certain hour. She did not drewn that way on noticed the trifling signs of this uneasing; but Didge, belge ing 'Sich White fill ogg-shells with the golden "was," ha just as well as herself what she was waiting for. Direct lanew that a certain young gentl man was within half a miof that very spot, in Willow Sturgies' hour, in that, and that Sum was to meet him at the vile at seven o'cle h, and in the book to the wilow's with him for an hour's intimit, in which some very important matters were to be dill.

Now if ever there was a person met deple and tailly infiducted, it was Dobby with the your later. T. T. flet that he loved her niece in tal of her lit only hat he is ler per int. She had red these projects but made herself to dreum they were a ldressel to her; and the interior she could pull Stan's heir and boy her cars for him their recipient.

And now a strange longing took position of here is to ing to enjoy a little surreptitions blin. In the tail a did not have been experience) tracht ber that the anxiet ber bar be only on the appoint I spot. The middle as it daly. While Som Higgs along, waiting for in and even a little post it, as say rith are not to do, to lest som body double red in her innount is to tet Ler hart, D blog slipped out on to the period which is in the stile, and stole about buildly, respect to their best ingen that which her charms on it never with Cat-like she crept along and over the stile; somebody was on the other side.

" Is that you, degrest?" whispered a thrilling voice.

"Yes!" was the faintly breathed reply.

" My own! my blesselone!-dear-bar-barest angel!"

When we remember that a lyerse circumstances had kept the lowers so long apart, and what anxiety hung over their stolen interview, we can forgive the extravagant raptures of the years man. His hand sought that of his companion, his arm stolen in the waist, and he present upon her lips the first timid, thrilling kiss of love.

"Sink, my durling, tell me you are well, and so glad to meet me."

Directly sthe sweet mailen was overwhelmed with joy and conficien, for she ching closer, but spoke not. Well, kisses are elepant in their language, and Harry, carried away by his horal Lappiness, drew her to his boson, and imprinted half a loon on the crossy lips. At that moment there was a creatly of the dry haves on the path. Harry drew his him helps r, and wait him silence for the steps to pass.

All at one a bright light flished up on the other side of the control of the control of the constant means the control of the which he had soaked in turpentine.

Por D Weyt She had made a confident of the invidens S. A, as to the proposal meeting between his rival and S san, and that brave youth, urgot on by the natural maller of his had no, had thought to entrap, betray, surprise, and mortify the off a ling pair. The love of practical jokes, or any other oursets as fun, is strong in new sattlements, and the young false had thought it nice sport to come, at 'Slah's hidding, and hap throw light on a strictly private affair which should not have concerned them at all.

Problem is the astonishment of 'Slah at the sight which mut his care. It bby -Dabby Carter, ancient spin for and most plans of women -the very person who had reveded to him the base conspiracy between her nices and this had some and discontable young gentleman—Miss Dabbrah Carter harself in the arms of this man.

Disconcerted as was 'Siah, his rival was still more so. The perplexity with which he gazed upon the maiden in his embrace was only equaled by the suddenness with which he withdrew his support, leaving her to face the kindling illumination and the amazed countenances as best she might. In the background of all these surprises stood Susan, moving on tip-toe, just as she was arrested by the light, while gliding toward the stile.

"Ugh!" said Harry, with a slight shudder.

"Oh! oh!" said 'Siah, with a loud laugh.

Jeers and merriment broke from the surrounding lads and lassies.

"'Scuse us, Miss Debby," spoke up 'Siah, "we'd no idee we was intrudin' on so interestin' an occasion."

Overcome by the force of circumstances, Debby burst into tears.

"That fellow is a villain," she shrieked, after a moment spent in tears, and in collecting her wits for an emergency,—
"a shameful villain, or he wouldn't seize on a helpless woman as was comin' over the stile, and hug and kiss her as hard as he could. I tried to get away (sob) as hard as I could, (sob) but he just squeezed me up, (sob) and kissed me so that I couldn't holler!"

This exclamation of the weeping maiden was received with yells of applause.

"Come, 'Siah White, you're a beau of her'n—you ought to thrash the rascal," called out one of the young men.

"No, I ain't no beau of her'n," answered Josiah, hotly, looking very much ashamed of himself. "If I hadn't thought 'twas Susan he was after, you wouldn't have catched me here. You're welcome to your fine beau, and good-night to you, M. S Debby."

Before any of the party turned around, Soon hill behind a huge tree; escaping unobserved, as the mischievers sogarmakers returned to their work, leaving D bby to stalk home in high dad con, and the coast clear for an important consultation with the young gentleman.

Full of wrath, Debby went home and read Mr. Carter all the love-letters his un lutiful daughter had been receiving.

CHAPTER IX.

A WEDDING AND A TRAGEDY.

"THANK the Lord, we're going to hear a sermon once arain," remarked Debby, the Saturday after the little event related in the last chapter.

There had been no stated preaching through the winter, the community relying for spiritual instruction upon an occasional traveling missionary; and now that one of these proposed to stop in the vicinity for three or four weeks, and hold a series of meetings in the little brown school-house, everylody who loved to keep the Sabbath in the good way of the old homes they had left, were rejoicing.

"I won br if it will be warm enough for me to wear my white dress," sail S sie, going to the door and looking out.

Although it was not yet the first of April, the grass was green, the worm air smelled of the spring flowers, and the sky was as the as Sasi's eyes—which is speaking well of the sky.

A white frock, with rural mailens, is the one best dress, suitable for all occasions—to wear to the party, to meeting, to the "caravan," the husking bee, and the ball. Dubly thought nothing strange of her nicce's wish to wear her white robe.

"I hope you won't think of wearin' it without washin', after it's laid all wint r in the smoke and dust," she replied.

"No, indeed, Aunt Debby, that I shon't;" and Sasie plunged the procious gown into a tab, rolled up her sleeves, displaying her dimpled clows by the act, got the washboard, and the hot water, and half an hour thereafter, the dress was spread upon the groon grass like a great spider's web, so soft and fine it was.

There was a glow in the young cirl's check that was not brought there, even by the heat of the irons, as she "did up" her dress that same afternoon. Very carefully she clept d and pulled and smoothed the snowy fabric, very elaborately she straightened and loosened the manifold tucks, very daintily she freshened up the thread-lace trimming. Yet her busy little fingers trembled all the time; and she could not sing at her work, as usual—her heart was too fall.

"Don't spend the hull blessed afternoon on that fack," grumbled her aunt. "I presume it will rain, and then you'll have to wear your calico. There's your father's shirt-boom to be done up, and his other pair of trows as to be specifical and presed. As for me, I've got enough to do, baking cake and scourin' up the hitchen. I'm goin' to ask the minist a to stop with us over Sunday night."

The freek, as fresh, as pure, as airy as hands could make it, was laid on the bed, and Susan got her father's wards be in order to go to meeting on the morrow. As she iread his shirt bosom, she lingered over it loyingly, dampening it with tear-drops which fill unnoticed by her busy relative.

That fither, so sid, so morose, who had always be a so in bilgent to her, who had never been harsh I fact to disagreedly or arreness which had seemed to change his to per so much—who loved her better than his lift, now, the will all his thin topposition to her true happines—she was a lear to dischey, to desert. Yet the desertion, she felt or the, would be only for a short period—who a he found that she was really married to Harry Gardiner, who would treat him as a relar and confir upon him opal nee for his, she therealt has a ly would not cling to his foolish bitterness.

The next day, the little school-house was crowned to everflowing. Sis in, sitting is tween her father in hunt, the chi she tried hard to fix her thou his upon the character appears of the proacher, heard little that he said; not the conprayed devortly, her head and heart were in a whirl.

After the first services, the people seattered also at the part and in the adjoining woods, to cut their lands and walt for the afternoon service; as the most of them is also for away to go home at noon-time. It was as bottled a spring day as ever shone, when and clear; the law same out on the maples, rustling lightly at the total of war bring winds. Debby, ever conspicious in good oil specifical har lunch-based, well stored with the skilf d work of his holes.

to the minister. Susie stood near, and at every glance of the good man's eyes, her own would droop, and soft blushes would flit over her face.

Willow Stargiss?" said the preacher, thanking Debby for the piece of gingerbread he took from her hand. "I do not see the willow here to-day; and, as she has been sorely affected, I must seek her out."

"You can hardly get there, sir, and back, before time for afternoon preachin"," said Debby, much slighted that the invitation had not been extended to herself in place of that little chit.

"We can make good time, both of us," said the tall minister, smiling down at his companion; "to night, Mi's Deberah, I shall be glad to accept your kind invitation to stop at your house. Come, child."

With steps that did not seem to touch the ground, the young girl walked by the good man's side through the forest path, until they come to the house of the willow. The little woman, in her best cloth s, and all the children in new suits, crowded about the door, waiting for the expected visitors.

And Sixon, with one swift glance, perceived another form at the window, which made her pause for a mement and half draw back.

"Have corrare, my daughter," said the preacher, "thou hast propriety of this step thou hast replyed to take. We are all in the presence of our Father in heaven."

They reached the cabin; and only pausing to take off her plain straw bonnet, and fasten a knot of violets which she had gather d by the way, in her bosom, Susan stool up by Harry's side. He was pale with the intensity of his emotions, though his eyes shone with a clear radiance which spoke cloquently to the minister of the truth of his love for the fair young creature, who, in five minutes after their entrance, was his wife.

Mrs. Strigies wept as she looked at the beautiful couple so remailedly married; the miniter proyed earnestly for their present and eternal welfare; and then, after one hiss, one chaping guze, Samu turned back, with her reverend friend, for the meeting. She was to attend the afternoon services, to avert suspicion; then, when Debby was busy getting tea, after the day's exercises, for her honored guest, Sasan was to slip out in the direction of Mrs. Sturgiss', be met on her way by her husband, who would await her coming with a bazzy and swift horse. The dusk of evening would protect them from the observation of acquaintances they might meet; they would ride thirty miles to the nearest large town, where Harry had engaged board for them, leaving the minister who performed the ceremony to break the news of the marriage to her father, and present, at the same time, a petition for their purlon.

"Ain't you going to set the table, while I make the list cuits? seems to me you don't know which on I your heal's on to-day."

Susan looked out at the golden sun just sinking Is hind the trees. It was the signal.

"I must take off this frock, Debby," she answered; and going into the parlor where her father and the parson sattalking, she brought forth her brown alphan and attired her self in that.

"Bring me a pail of water, Susan, and be spry."

Susan took the bucket and went out,—she had thrown har shawl and bonnet out of the win low, while Della's had was in the flour-barrel,—snatched her garments from the cross gave one lingering look as she passed the win low by which her father sat, with his back to it, and fled through the garlen, over the fence, and was hidden from the house by the trees.

She hurried along, her heart beating like a trip-hammer, expecting every moment to meet him. When she came in sight of Mrs. Sturgiss' cabin, without seeing any thing of him, she blushed as she blamed herself.

"I am too early," she murmured, turning back, and lingering on the way until she came to the stile near the lower part of her father's garden. Again she went over the path, and this time she went to the widow's door to impairs if Harry had changed his plans or left any new world for her.

"No; he had gone out nigh upon two hours and, after his horse and burry, which was back a piece in the horse."

It was deep twilight when Sus noleft the will wis nole in tagered over the way, expecting every in test when that corr voice would whisper her name, and she should be safe in her husband's arms.

Alas! for Susan, that happy moment came not. Hour after hour she paced the lonely wools. Convinced that something must have happened to detain him, she remained in the path until midnight; and when he did not make his appearance then, she felt that they must await for some other opportunity to take their flight.

Yet how could that be effected, when the person had, ere this, told the whole story to her father? There was nothing to do but to go home, brave his anger, and wait for her husband to come and claim her. Perhaps this, after all, would turn out for the best. Only—only, she suffered such suspense as to the cause of this unaccountable absence.

The lights were barning in her father's house until one o'clock. She went, and sat on the step by the kitchen-door, but she would not go in; and there the gray morning found her, chilled and miserable.

"Soho, mudam! has your husband sent you back so soon?" asked the squatter, as he came out of the door at dawn for chips to kindle the fire.

"Oh, father, something has happened to him, I'm sure! I have not seen him this night. Will you not go and find out, for my sake, father?"

Her pale face smote him to the heart; but his suspicious nature did not allow him to look upon this absence as an accident.

"You heed never expect to see him, you little fool. I warn I you, but you wouldn't listen to your father. 'Tisn't enough for him to come breakin' up the fathers, but he must meddle with the daughters."

"I would pledge my lik, father, that he is not to lame."

"Oh, of course—of course! that's the way with girls—they've been made fools of thre now. My advice to you, girl, is to come into the house and keep quiet. The more this affir is he hel up, the better 'twill be for you. If it hadn't been for your folly, that fellow would have got his deserts down to the pend lost winter. As for Parson Brown, if he want a minister, I'd lick him, and I told him so lost night! Lines not the ras als got half a loren wives already. What do a we know to the contrary?"

How did she, indeed? by a knowledge that was satisfactory to herself, by the evidence of soul to soul—but there was no proof she could place before her father. She could not confute his suspicious, though not a doubt troubled her own breest.

She went into the house, helping Debby prepare the brakfast, as usual. Parson Brown looked grave and mossy; he began to regret the east with which he had allowed the young couple to work upon his benevolent feelings. But Sismis eye did not falter as it met his. She was nervous and excit d; her restless glance told plainly that she was expecting Harry to appear and clear up the mystery—she was made affair, but not ashamed.

The morning passed away without bringing any arrival. The parson had lingered, in the hope that when the years husband came, his influence over Mr. Carter would prevent a quarrel. Now he whispered to Susan:

"I will go and make inquiries. No one knows the state of affairs but ourselves and Mrs. Sturgiss. Keep still, until I return."

Shooleyed him, rimining at home, when her fit humed to fly through the forest, to the tayon, everywhere in such of tilians. About four o'clock in the ato mean, Pars in Brown returned. There was nothing known of Mr. Garling at the tayon. He had paid his bill the previous day, and tidd the builded that he was going to Pontize that hight. A complete farmers had son two men, one of whom resulted Garliner, driving off on the south road, in a buggy with a black horse.

"The Lord give thee patience to bear thy cress, my child." I sincerely regret that thou and I wert so deceived. Certainly, he had a specious way with him which would have deceived an angel."

"He has decrived no one—you will find it out a me day. He has been waylaid. His life has been threatened, you have; and now he is murdered—murdered!" and her torited word hope both give way before the despair which rush down her.

Even Debly forebore to tent the por this could be was her unhappiness. All the bloom of youth we strike a from her face; she would sit for Louis, giving up a tot the site wore, and then start up and wander out into the livest in search of some trace of the one she persited in believing murdered.

But there came news, after several days, which dispersed this belief. Mr. Gardiner's lawyer received a letter from him, directing him to press his suits against the squatters, raise all the money he could, conveniently or otherwise, and forward to his a ldress, as given in the letter. When the purson heard of this letter, he borrowed it for the purpose of convincing the trusting girl she had been mistaken.

"If ever he comes in my way again, I swear a revenge which nothing on 'arth can thwart," muttered the squatter.

The joyous heart of the girl was changed into a dull, aching thing, which could neither be glad nor sorry.

The household was a more discontented one than ever. Mr. Carter was now determined to carry out his plan of removing to another State, or portion of the State he was in. They were getting poorer every day; besides, he secretly hoped that a change would revive his daughter's health and spirits.

Where they were going, or what they should do for a living, were quistions not wholly decided. He was going to keep on the road until he saw some chance of getting into business somewhere. Josiah White came over to help them pack up. He offered himself again to Sasan, with what success may be conjectured.

The one-hor e wagon held the squatter's findly and all their worldly goods which was left over, after disposing of a part to furnish them with a little ready money. The blue convex which had sheltered them on their long journey from the Lat, was again stretched over the hiskory hoops which are held their not of the water. A small red cheet, which a run days at fir Sole, we still I with cell bolled pack and be filtered and one is given to off a constitution of the engineering to be a first and a few tind has were pecked conveniently for use; and on a May money, with the neighbors stending about the farewell, with the cow tied belief the warm and the old horse metaling pithally in the front, the family set dolefully out on their journey.

The changing seemes of their slow march were more like dreams than realities to Sasan. Sometimes they get out of the wagon and walked up long hills. At non they rested in some convenient spot and eat their lunch, taking a drink of water from the running stream. At night, it any however was in sight, they stopped at it, paying for their bods, and cooking their meals themselves; otherwise they camped by the roadside, building a fire to prepare their supper, and taking such rest as they could obtain in the shelter of the wagon. Sukey gave them what little milk she could keep up in the wearis and journey. Susan always milked the animal horself, who is instead more a friend to her than her own relatives—for was not that cow, with her great, mild, gazelle-like eyes, gazing at hor through the fence with dumb affection, that terribber values when she waited in the forest for one who never cause?

Smoking his pipe from morning till night, the farmer jered on the never-ending road, saying little to any one. Dely knit stockings to pass away the time, crish, sold her was amiable, as the mood took her; and Some set with a list hands, staring at the way with vacant eyes.

The hard side of life seemed spread for these people to walk upon. Debby mourned in secret over her class for matrimony, which seemed to her to diminish in exact ratio with the miles they traveled away from a people as community.

"I'm glad your mother hasn't livel to see still laps as these," Mr. Carter remarked, one terrible, stormy night, as the three sat huddled in the wagon, unable to sleep for the will tumult of the elements.

"Oh, father, you brought it on yourself," cried Sisan ganded to desperation by their misery.

"I didn't! never flare up to me again in that way!" and the obstinate man shook her roughly by the shook her. "It's all brought on us by a disobellent child. You make up your mind to be y your parent."

"A thankless and disob dient child will a ver recive my blessing," chimed in Debby. "She to k that ir in her in ther's side of the family—that obstinate strock in her—i'r I'm s me she never got it from one of the Carter's. The Carter's are known for their meekness and purity. O L rll he wit has pour down! The Carter's have been a likely people from generation to generation. I reckon there never was such a thing as a runaway marriage took place in the family before. As for not, I'd stay unmarried till I was a hundred years old, before I'd fly in my father's free, if I had a father, and pick up a husband against his will. It's astonishing how anxious young toks are to get married now-a-days. If I'd been as eager as some, I shouldn't have refused as many as I have. There was that Zekiel—"

Del by's reminiscence of her past conquests was overwhelmed by a vivil flash and an instantaneous crash, and the whole party were hightened by the jar of the wagon, caused by some of the branches of a tree, splintered by lightning, falling upon the back part of it. It was an awful night. During the pauses of the tempest, they could hear the creep and hiss of snakes, and the deally rattle of the most dreaded of them all. They dured not have the shelter of their wagon an instant, though they expected momentarily the fall of some neighboring tree upon it, and they supposed their horse would be bitten by the venomous reptiles, and they be left helpless upon the road.

Debby never prayed before as she prayed that night; and even Mr. Carter, stubb on and self-reliant as he was, and unacted med to the words of prayer, ground an "amen!" to her prittions for softy. Once, in that will storm, a horse and learny dished by them; they saw it an instant by the light-ning's glare, specking on, as if no power of the chanents could dated the two men, whose figures stood out one second against the lurid sky.

CHAPTER X.

THE FOREST INN.

"Did you notice that girl that waited on table to-night, Bill?"

"Can't say as I did, in particular; handsome, wasn't slee?"

"She was more than handsome, Bill; something in her face has put me out of conceit with myself. I wish we had better work on hand than making pewter dollars with silver coats on."

"Oh, ho! now don't get in one of your sentimental fits, Jim."

The rain beat wildly on the one small win low, and on the roof which was just above their heads; the wind rare larou. I the corner of the house, swinging the little sign of the Bi. k Bear tayern with a harsh creaking; the pin-tres all about whistled and shricked; the two travelers who sat in their little garret be knoom, with the shingles almost toching their heads, were fortunate in escaping the storm in so combine the a shelter as this. They had dried themselves by a blazing fire in the bar-room below, warmed thems lives with a glass of liquor, and partaken of a good supper in the kitchen; new they had retired to a private apartment, which, close and bere es it was of all furniture except a rule bel, prime it answer their purposes very well. The trunk, which had be a strapped on behind the burry in which they had arrived at their destination, they had carried up with them. But to they opened this, and took from it the implements of their train, one of them hung his overcost over a crack in the derivate stuck his long knife in the lint l, to save as a blit. The boked toward the little uncurtained window, from left i ar punes of glass; but there were no witness s in the wester and es which deshed up and down, alm st against the sell, where testimony could betray them.

It is no wonder they were down late to breakfast the next morning, for it was long after milnight before the dim light which glared from their room was put out. The family who kept the Black Bear had partaken of the morning meal, and the table was re-arranged for the two guests, at present the only strangers at the inn.

"This don't look much like the grab we've been getting lately," remarked the elder of the two, with a satisfied expression; and he drew the carving knife through a nicely-boiled slice of ham.

There was nothing but fried ham and ears, corn-cake, and honey upon the table; but these were neatly arranged and properly cooked, while the coffee served to them was excellent, with cream to season it.

"Susan, ask the gentlemen if they'll have another hot cake?"

It was nobedy but Debby who said this, jerking the cover off the bake-kettle, and revealing a relay of johnnyeake done to a turn.

"If it's equal to the one that's gone before, we shan't object," answered the same person who had spoken first; the yearner one was improving every opportunity of a lairing the girl, who looked about as much at home in the place she filled, as a rose in a bramble-field.

"Try it and judge for yourself," returned Debby, bringing the cake to the table herself with a satisfied look.

Doby took to the calling of hin thely naturally—all she regretted was, that her talents were wasted in so narrow a sphere. If she had been mistressed Giles' tovern, she would have been content; but the Black Boar was a smaller hore, in a still with rand remoter region, whose stream of cust has an times flowed very thin, even to drying up entirely; but which afford I to Mr. Corter, disabled as he was, the only means of living he could at present attain.

The months are, the Cart r's had drove up to the lonely inn, with the provisions in the three chest exhausted, and the provisions in the three chest exhausted, and the proof is of a settlement as far away as ever; had found the computes of the house anxious to give it up and get away; at the left of a bargain with them before retiring to rest, by which, in exchange for their house had a war nothing to rest, by and stock of the house was to be theirs. The stock or sisted of a barrel of whisky, a demijohn of branky, some corn meal and hams, and a few groceries; the familiare comprised a tow benches and a bar; in the one sitting-room, a bar table and a dozen chairs; kettles and dishes in the kile on, and in r meager beds in as many little rooms divided of in the atti-Even this burren and on wellthy place put on an area comfort and medices, if not relieved, under the solver and and nime. The white dimity curtains which had harr ever their win lows in their of I home, were put up in the kinds. which was dining-room, sitting-room, and all to the methods other dipartment on the ground floor bing singly a barroom and loanging place. Debby's strong arm legt till I er white, and the dishes shining. There was always and heironed linen cloth on the table, and the plain procities were well-cooked.

Even in these three months, the reputation of the B. . it Bear had grown so, that people would present the fact had the evening, or stop early in the afternoon, for the sake of people the night at it.

The contest almost fling in relative two trails annoyed Susan. He seem I somewhere I to a prove of all and and thirty, spoke will, and drawlet value of a relative to the late of a relative to the part of the part

She was risk when they had find had to it had for an a love of the open air. The will stance a dependence out night had better manner or hard to be a Ahd when the san remembered what day it was, then had not be the real for a the real for the day upon which she had first nate Hary Garden at the camp-meeting. Only one little year; year, have all the world was changed to her!

"Have you ill our here, pet, Carter!-lit and lim."

The three men strell I by the like here's rent interpretable shell a large law, open at the which here's rent in place of a stable. Some was considered as a constant of the chickens in the yard.

"It's a fine animal, raally," she heard her father remark.

Looking up mechanically, her attention was arrested by the horse—a jet-lick, spirited animal, with a star in his forehead, and two white fore feet; all the rest of his cont as black and glossy as a raven's. She knew him in a minute—he was Harry's horse! Her heart gave one great leap, then fluttered like a wounded bird. Here was a clue; if she drew upon it sub-lendy or perceptibly to others, she might break it. She had beard the strangers say they had business which would keep them at the house two or three weeks. In that time she could certainly learn if that horse was purchased from Mr. Gardher, when, and where. Her next discovery was that the larry was also the same used by Harry twice, on his visits to Mrs. Sturgiss. She remembered the painting upon the panel—a pointer-dog, with a partridge in his mouth.

Whether these things had been purchased; whether these persons were friends of his; whether they had been stolen, and he the victim of some outrace, were conjectures which naturally arose. As she looked at the men, contrasting them with Harry, she would not believe they could be his friends; and yet, if they were not—oh, how black were the suspicions which be the them.

In the course of the for noon, taking care to choose a time When they were out of the hour, she went to just their room in or br. With eyes short ned by what she had already seen, she oberseld of ely all the articles they had left lying about. Out of the over set which was left hunging from the rafters, the corner of a har likerchief protruded; some impulse urged her to draw it i ith -in a land which she knew so well, she from I marked the letters "H. G." All her long-suff ring selfcontrol gave way as she gazed, like one fascinated, upon the familiar characters. Perhaps that was the very handkerchief by had once tied about her neck, with tender fear that she would take cold, that night on which they had appointed the the and place of their welling. It had been touched by Lim-was his! Oblivious of any later ownership, she ki sed it, pressed it to her bosom, buried her thre in it with quivering, stitled sobs. Absorbed in grief as she was, one of the strangers entered the room unheard by her; it was "Jim" Cress, the younger of the two.

"Why do you weep? may I not ask?" and he removed her hands from her face.

She started as if she were stung; he did not notice whose handkerchief she held, but he felt the haughty anger of her look.

"Pardon me, Miss Carter; I had no right to speak to you."

Do not fear that I shall be rude to you."

"I am not afraid; I have a father."

"And if you had not, it would be all the same. Indeed, I was sincerely sorry for you; you must be so lonely and so of place here. I was thinking about it before I came in."

His manner grew so respectful, that she had nothing to recent; but she hurried from the room without raply, taking with her the precious handkerchief.

The family and their guests dined and supped together. In the early part of the evening Mr. Cross line red in the life here, making him elf agreeable to Debby. He was an later thing talker, not ignorant of the world, and won the factually regards of the elder hely by deferential attentions, while his eyes were constantly upon Susan. She could not had be an are of this, and it made her very uneasy, though there was a thrightness of the regard.

Sus an was hardly conscious how far in the let I advises; she thought of herself as a pale, s.d. willowed your contract for whom the world had bet its brinking; and she is at that to others she was an unmarried wends, very be attended and very pleasing.

Once, looking up from her sewing, she met his Bill car, which was so carnest, so half-mountal, that she was superal.

"You remind me of my only sister," he said, as if in a logy. "She was just as young and fair as you when I we her last, and as pure—too pure to a cold with a low. The local a will fillow, M. s Carber, you I had a seed in the cold sister."

He sighed deply. Susan, ever a nthemal Christian in her disposition, was sarry for him. She saw that he had been will, as he said—his face here the traces of had declarate she thought he might yet reform, and he come the prihace the sister whom he praised. Hitherto she had remained such, making her sewing an excuse for not joining in the converse.

tion; now, she made an occasional friendly remark, for which the young man some I grateful. While the upper current of social intercours: flowed smoothly along, there was constantly in her mind an undercurrent of wonder if she were really being thus kind to a person who had taken part in the robbery and murder of her husband.

While it was yet early, the strangers retired to their room. When Sus an and Debby went past their door, an hour later, the light stole through the crevits at the lattom.

Susan Ly awake many hours that night. The room occupied by herself and her aunt, was divided by a plastered partition from the one occupied by their guests. She heard enough to convince her that they were up nearly all night—a whisper now and then, and, after the house was very quiet, the muffl delink of metal. No car but one strained for the purpose could have detected these sounds.

Every day and night there was the same experime; the man pleasant and polite, and the younger so absorbed in every lock and mation of the landlord's daughter, that the whole house took note of it.

"You've get another but, Sie; be whe, and faret the part," but he life (arter, arter a week or two of this intercurs, his july must quite taken ceptive by the species of forts of Mr. Cross to please him.

The surging 1 - werity of her book rebuled him, and at the startine made him mary -- was she always to go maping around thinking of that worthless Gardiner?

In the me in time So in hich made a discovery. So ortain she was that they were harboring unlawful deines, and so decrminal to unrivel the mystery of Harry's property being in the har scale from metal to he very example of a small polarization. It is applied that between their result. This has similarly expect their side of the wall, so minute it were the law of the organization of the mean. By the means she is entired to a contacty that they were entire them and thread the or more insulative coins. In the law trans, which they had them lives conveyed upstains so ear fully, were the rough bars of spinlars metal, and all the apparatus for converting it into deliver. She saw the Lagrangian of the tiny charcoal furnace, over which they maked the

They had pretended, to her father, that they were waiting i'r friends, who were going on with them to purchase here's of the Indians; but Sasie knew that when their dishonest work was done of converting the metal into coin, they would be ready to depart.

She was very much startled by her discovery. She dared not betray them, even to her father, at present, for four of the consequences. It was not likely such cool and long-practical villains would allow a lonely family to stand in their way; if they knew they were suspected they would be sure to take care of their own interests at all events. They had pist is and bowie-knives in profusion, while her poor old father had but a single rifle.

With great discretion, she resolved upon keeping their secret, until some time when there should be a party of other guests at the house. There were no officers of the law immediately at hand in that out-of-the-way place; all might be procured by going after it, but her father had no enveyance.

So careful was she lest her tell-tale count-name should reveal her thoughts, that she made more of an effort than she would otherwise have done, to receive with civility to ir attempts to be agreeable.

She dreaded the arrival of the expected filends, who, of course, would be a part of the same netations learner. Since times she shuddered at the thought of her own almost unjurated 1 situation when the house should be filled with so he company.

Debby had no such troublesome thoughts. She was placed to have guests in the house who paid well and believed the resolves. So extreme was their gallantry, it may be she thirty dream dof cleanging her situation in life, as, since Mr. Gardiner had married her nice, it would be while him her positions to remain a tapen han, be healed a radive. She shered away per early at nights, while Some lying by her side and next to the wall, kept awake to hand observe.

One night she overheard them mention Harry's name. The blood rushed up into her head, beating so loudly in her ears, that for a time she heard nothing, though every nerve was strained to agony.

"I've always felt sorry about it," were the words she next detected, spoken by Jim Cross.

"Posh! you're too chicken-hearted to make a good raseal," jeer I the other. "I've sometimes thought we'd better put you out of the gang."

"I wish to heaven I were out of it, Bill; I do, indeed—and let ling an honest life. I've about made up my mind to go out. You needn't look black—I shan't peach, under any circumstances."

"Of course you won't if you want to live and enjoy the sailty of your file. I didn't think a girl could make such a fool of you, Jim."

"She isn't a girl, she's an angel. I can't stand the bolt of the cycl. Every bad thing I ever dil se ms to rise bolt reme."

"Se's enfound I protty, that's a fiet. But I don't see Why that need to make a Paritan of you."

"B and I I we have and respect her. She reminds mosefully own sweet siter. If I thought she would love me, would be mire, I would try hard to be what I used to be."

"Oh, bosh! tend to your die, Jim."

They works I in these for some moments. The bergal of they me man's feliers, which she had hearl, harlly made I is a tall, so after was the anxiety with which she will to hear some firther mention of her hisbank. It is a if her heart would wrench it it apart.

"I can be tend me this another by," she thought. "I will be to that man to morrow. He says he boses me. I will the very life upon his pity--he man, he shall tell me what he has done to Harry."

"He deatht like a tiger," remarked Jim, presently, as if his mind were haunted with the idea.

"Who? oh, Garliner-yes! but four to one was too many.
I'l' rll. lift ht in him."

"I'. residt more than two nights' work on hand, now," we to much subsect "I have the fellows will be up to time."

"I dat that in much of a horry," will Jim.

"If the girl will have you, maybe we'd better have you here to keep tavern for us. This would make us good head-quarters."

"So it would," replied Jim. "If I can serew my courage to the sticking-point, I'll ask her to-morrow."

Susin listened in vain for further revelitions. Sloop and rest came to all, even to the guilty counterf it is, but not to her. More weary than when she lay down, she reset the next morning. The flush on her che k and glitter in her eye, were those of fever and nervous excitement.

"You look like your-elf agin, Swan; I hain't som your checks so rel in a long time," Mr. Carter remarked, at the breakfast-table.

"She's healthy enough, if she'd only think so," said Dily, charitably.

After breakfast, Jim Cross and Mr. Cater sationally fince by the shell, talking tegether for over an hour. Soon, busy with her work, observed them, dreading what she know was to come, yet so terribly anxious to burn the fat of her haseband, that the morning seemed a year loan. After the two men separated, Jim evidently writed an opportunity of spaking to her alone; her father told her, of a climar, to not other blackburry patch, and pick some burns for tea. The point was within sight and hearing of the hour, so she was not afraid. Taking a little tin backet, she set north, and he are she had passed the stile, Cross joined her, asking points in to assist her. For awhile they gather had the promised in silence; the pail promised to be full buffer they should come to an understanding.

"Mis Carter-Sean-Iswear I lave you to did not "."

This arowal burst forth with at any preliminary special She looked up fall into his free, which was white, and his open ourning—his gaze, there with doubt and pastic, said in the her piercing look, but he hereich i en in a decide it to said.

"I love you, desperately. You are to all firms I know. But if you will marry me, I will a kear but read. You shall see fine times. Two got many. You relate work, nor stay in this lone some place. I will have you in slike and sating, and do who ever you ask of read. Yes, now! Your father has given his enough."

"Has my futher given his consent, Mr. Cross?"

"He has, and seemed pleased with the idea. No wonder at that—he can't marry his girl off any day in this savage place. I've promised to provide for him as long as he lives."

"Dill he not tell you that I am a married woman?"

"Marriel? are you in carnest? 3, re-you are fooling me, to prevent giving me an up-an l-down answer."

I am not trifling with you at all, Mr. Cross. God knows I am in no humor to trifle. I have be a married over three months, but I have never sea my hashard since I part I from him in the presence of the minister, five minutes after the ecremony. Mr. Cross"—chaping her hands, and knowing before him—"you know where he is! whether he is died or ally. Tell me, for my sake, to save me from insanity or said the tell me what did you do to Harry Gardiner?"

"Gar liner!" muttered he, falling back from her, as he heard the name.

"Yes! yes! yes! tell me what you have done with him."

"So he was your husband, was he? and he was going to ran away with a bride that night we trapped him? no won ler he fought like a punther,—I'd have done the same."

"Tell me!" implored Sasan, her hands chesped and stretch-ed forth toward him.

"My poor girl, I'm afraid you're a willow as well as a bride."

Similar to scream nor faint—she seemed to freeze before him.

"Dan't look at me ...," mutt red the young men; "I can't stop lit. I had no hand in the nurder, though I had in the relary. I tried to coax 'em from using violence. I did, in the L. I tried to save him! You see, I was a new han hand I couldn't bear the sight of blood?"—her mute look impel' I him on to speak hurriedly, as if he must tell all to that strick in woman kneeling there. "You see there's most always some of us hanging about these towns, on the book-out for me, and some of us found out that Gurdiner had been giving considerable money together. We'd make it up to not him, when some men came to as with another proposition. Some of us were known to some of the squatters—they know we had lin't stop at any living the real triangle plan and they to here.

us about Gardiner, and they'd made up their minds to char him out of the State. They offered us a good sum of noney, besides all we could get from him, if we'd quietly ki hap him, and convey him some shere, where he wouldn't trouble them any more. Come to think, your own father was one of the men. It's the same name, and I recollect, he must be the man, though I never thought of it before, as I saw him but once in the evening. Of course they didn't ask us to kill him, out and out, but they showed very plain they she illust care it we did. Our plan was to gag him and earry him off wh re he wasn't known, nor we either, accuse him of stelling the horse and barry we took from him, so car him the again art, and get him in the penitentiary. I was the best elected of the whole gang, and had had plenty of practice in firs ry - - tar that was the first step I took in crime, which drove in it in home and broke my mother's heart—and I was to make a still better thing of it, by gettion his papers, and indicate his writing to draw on his lawyer for finds, as long as we could carry on the game without detection. But when we size I and gazzed him, that evening, though there was four of as, he made such a fight, we had as much as we could do to see the him, and Bill Ellis, the one that's with me now, hit him a big w over the heal with a bill-t of wood he'd picked his Hellicht mean to murd r him, only to quit him a little, but he ill over like a log. So as we did not want to have him there, for the authorities to get after us, we put him in the learny, and two of us got in, and the other two took heres, and we drove nearly all night, and just before morning we dimen ! him out in a lonely piece of woods, and there, I signed he lies yet."

Still those glittering eyes and that icy fee were natural, metionless. He could not endure the wretched silence, and continued hurriedly:

opposed to it, and I felt ball about it. Don't bluncher, Some expression it, and I felt ball about it. Don't bluncher, Some edon't! Ever since I to it that the filt with that the corpe, I've be a swern to quit the gene, as some I could get out of it. I wasn't made for such things. I've to the matter, and a fitter, just the another angle as pare it. I want to be every, but I'm additional the filter of the filter. I've to be a want to be every, but I'm additional the filter of the filter.

power, and they're afraid I'll peach if I leave them. But if you will have me, if you'll forgive the past, and try to learn to like me, I'll dare every thing, and quit, and lead an honest life."

"Like paramal my father, he saw me suffer, but did not relent."

She arose and walked home; he did not dare to follow her, just then.

"What's the matter?" asked Debby, startled by the look of the girl's face.

"Nothing."

"Eh, Sue, didn't you like your new beau?"

"It's rather soon for a widow to be choosing again, father." How strings she talked, and how strange she looked. Mr. Carter and Debby exclusived anxious glunces. She passed them by, going up to her room, where she laid herself upon the bed, and realized nothing more for many hours. Debby came up to look at her, but went back again, saying she was asleep.

Published Semi-Monthly.

The Willest Wood of the Asset Popular Anthon.

THE BACK TOURS DRIDE:

BOMLIFCE OF SULLTER LEFE.

Manie With the Co., 113 No. 14 (L).

Fatered accepting to Art of Congress, in the Yea true & Co., in the Chris's Other of the Learnet Court of the United the Southern Basiciat of News York.

CHAPTER XI.

THE MIDNIGHT RIDE.

"Court, Susan, are you sick? If you ain't, zet up and help me—the house is full of folks,—and chickens to be picked, and dourhnuts fried, and lots to be done."

"I'm not sick;" and Susan roused herself from the dall trance in which she had lain for several hears.

It was evening, and blowing up for a risk. She went down and found the bar-room full of company. They was drinking, laughing, singing, washing thems loss, sweater, and making plenty of confusion. Her father was out, at a ling to their horses. Debby was busy in the hit hen, into which she would not allow the travelers to enter, until the mean was ready.

"They're the friends our bour less expected," said she, " and they're most starved, and want a good supper. There's the of them. They've boucht lots of horses, and they're going a to buy more."

putting his head in the door.

Tend to your own afficies, and wait till I ask pen," re-

He do had his head, as if expecting to get his east mad, but there is into the poor a rain, excluding - your daughter?"

The Cahertwin sister, and she's a candidate here it." The ined Bill Hills to his him by—where open there was a rear of merriment, and Debby shanned the docrupon them "h.

It was a will and unditable some for a timble sustince girl like Susan; but this night she stemed to have no normal more hardly eyes or ears. She moved about rapilly, a sisting the preparations for supper, and afterward waited upon the noisy strangers to tea and coffee, taking all their rule jets and coarse compliments as a statue might have done.

Her folier, who carred for the company, where I at a not of the compline his, and appeared unessy at the spirit displayed. Almost for the first time it occurred to him how his made and sensitive child must be shocked by her surrounding chemistaness. A frown settled upon his brow, and he had at his rusty of lattle. But "he had made his bel," himself, and now "he must lie in it."

Their dozen of greats could not be accommodated up stairs without considerable crow line. The family proposed to be up a the kit han floor, giving up all the bels to the crowd. At rapper they were not long in getting drunk and sleepy, having rill a far that day, and the most of them retired early, two or three holding a confidential meeting in the room of Bill and Jim.

Deby and her brother were fidinged, to, with their extracts of the interpolated thems became an exploit of her locking on the floor and full aslep. Sisan by down in her challes, and protend to slumber; but the mount the horse wrapped in silmer, she are severy softly, open the door, and stole out.

She has withere was a sheriff residing in a sparse sittlement about ten miles from there, and probably enough neighbors to telling in his duty of anothing the gang of villains now reports in her father's heave. The counterf it money which she had seen in the probably and manuscrare, with other implements of their various nefatious callles, would be proof sufficient to convict them. She determined they should not their the hands of judge,—nor her had builts much results fully a sky of their crimes. She, usually so gentle, so forgiving had grown as hard and unrelating as so he. All the two yethers wish her nature some lifes a over. She could have he so this repeat pulled the triver which was to punitable as a factor of the large in sections.

Or place shall to the shell now full of horses, she apir the free could hak stoll which had once been Harry's, She had just thin so for fly, the three weeks of his stay,

THE PRISONER OF LA VINTRESSE!

BY MRS. MARY A. DENISON, Author of "Chip."

DEMPLE AND COMPARY ! ... 111 W. ... D. N. T.

that he had grown much attached to her, and knew her as soon as she spoke to him.

The night was dim, but not always dark. Ragged clouds fled over the sky, now concealing, now revealing, the pule face of the half-filled moon. Occasionally great drops of rain would patter down, and the wind surged in the pine-trees, making a tumult very welcome to the girl, as it drowned the noise of the horse's steps, as she led him forth to the read, with only a bridle on him, mounted him bare-backed, and walked him softly away until she was out of hearing of the house.

"Now, Prince, do your best," she murmured, patting him on the neck, and uttering a low cry, which sent him bounding off at full speed. The branches of the trees met above her over the road, easting strange and changeful shallows on the narrow way. At some moments every thing would be shreaded in darkness,—again the moon would sail forth, guzing down through the tossing foliage, at the maiden floing on her wild errand. She abated nothing of her speed in the darkest moments, trusting to the sagacity of the noble animal that here her.

She had rilden perhaps two miles, when she hear le me one in pursuit,—the gallop of a single herse, pressing on, has a short distance behind. She urged her steed to his util stepeed; the tramp came nearer, she was desirable additional transling hill, when the rider behind her somethed that a few paces from her. As she reached the bettem of the hill, she gave one backward glance, and discovered, in the sellen hell-liancy of the moon, the rider to be Jim Cross.

"Stop!" he shouted, "or I will shoot."

She only pressed forward the more urrently.

He gained upon her-he could almost kay his hand up in her bridle-rein.

"Suem, stop! you are going to betray us. Yeall: at your own peril."

He fell behind, but soon regained his less.

"Girl, do you dare? it will be no light matter for you to bring down the vengeance of the lague. They will never-let you-rest."

In vain dil he urge his parting horse and shout out brief sentences of threat and revenge. Susan had passed out of the limits of mortal fear. "Rest!"—she expected no rest in this world—they had already taken that from her. "Death!"—let the scoundred shoot her,—it would be well,—she should the sooner be with him they had torn from her.

On and on they then through the wild forest, each making their utmost effort. The pursuer began to flag,—the powerful horse which Sasan role, had few rivals in speed and endurance,—and he still galloped on easily, after the other dropped far behind.

She come upon cleared fields lying on either side of the road, log cabins, silent and dark, and soon was in the heart of the little settlement. She never had been in the place before, but she rode up to the largest of the cluster of houses, and knowked on the door with her riding-whip. She expected to be overtiken, and perhaps shot. Just as the sleepy inmotes were rousing themselves to open the door, her pursuer dashed past her—

"You're a gallant girl,—I'll give you credit for it. And since you're bound to betray my friends, I'm bound to leave 'em to their fate. You'll have a desperate fight, though. I've wanted to break away from them this long time. If you ever hear from me again, it will be in a better business!"—and on he flod, just as a man came out, wondering stupidly at the sight of a wearm on horseback, at that hour of the night.

"Where does the sheriff live?"

"The sherid? what?-why?-has any one been killed or any thing?"

"I need his services,—where is he?".
"He's over thar' in the third house."

She went and rous I up that hous hold, followed by her informant, carer to learn the news. The sheriff came out, scratching his head.

"I am the daughter of the man who keeps the Black Bear. There's a dependence set of counterfaiters and murderers stopping there to all his I filt it my daty to let you know. Can you among the man for enough to explain them?"

"Hang the reseals! my flagers has itched to get hold of conthis year past," said the shariff. "How many is there?"

- "A dozen-all armed."
- "I'm Traid 'twill be a tight time, what do you say, Homer?"

"Good fun,-I'm in."

" Wall, help me to rouse the boys, then."

- "Don't lose any time," sail Sasan. "If we can gain the house without arousing them, we won't have much trouble. You can surprise them, asleep, and disarm them."
- "Good lord, what'll we do with 'em when we get 'em—thar' ain't a buildin' secure enough to fasten up such rascals."
- "You must march them off to the next county, and holge them there. Or give them the benefit of lynch-law at once. I tell you they are dangerous men, murderers as well as robbers."
 - "My sakes! what a girl!" ejaculated the sheriff, a lmiringly.
- "If the boys have half her spunk, they'll secure every rascal of 'em," said his companion.

In a few minutes the whole settlement was arouse l. Every man who felt a disposition to assist the sheriff in his daty, armed himself with gun and knife, mounted his horse, and formed into rank. There were twenty-five in the posse.

They role back rapidly to the Black Bear. It was that deep hour after midnight, when slumber is profound st, that they reached the place. Dismounting in the forest, a quarter of a mile distant, they left their horses, and stele ferward silently to the inn. Susan entered the back door, and after arousing her father and aunt, explained to them the character of their guests, and that the sheriff was there to arrest the party. She did not stop to say that she had been the me als of bringing them there. In profound silence, the men tak their places, two at each door and window, to prevent escape, while the others entered within. The women thought lest not to be mixed up in the melee, and retreated to the rear of the shed, where they awaited the result. They heard outlist and shorts, windows crashed, and one or two slots fired. One fellow bounded over the fence close beside them, followed by a parting shot, and three or four men; but he struck into the woods and made his escape. All the rest were cuttred al secured; not without many bruiles, and a few slight workles. A sallen, wicked-boking set, after they found them-lives disarmed and overpowered.

When their captors came across the trunk full of counterfeit Unique and Original Books!

4 1 44 4 4

FAMILY, SCHOOL-ROOM EXHIBITION. &C.

THE EXTRAORDINARY SUCCESS OF

DEADLE'S DIME DIALOCUES No. 1,

DEALLE'S DIME SPEAKER No 1,

Has induced the publishers to prepare, at heavy expense,

Beadle's Dime Dialogues No. 2,

BEADLE'S DIME SPEAKER No. 2.

WHICH CONTAIN

MORE THAT Is orded TAL AND BUS.

Media THAT is company to the training

tered to the want.

AND TO THE HOMES OF AMERICA.

DEADEN AND CHELLIS

141 Willi:m Street, New Y ...

dollars, and other evidences of the character of their prisoners, they were for horsewhipping the whole lot, before delivering them over to the more tardy justice of the law. The barroom was turned into an extempore jail, where the rascals were kept until morning.

Debby and Susan prepared a good breakfast for the sheriff and his aids, while Mr. Carter served the prisoners with bread and coff e. For the whole expense of the entertainment of both parties he had his pay in property left on his hands. The horse and largy of the absconded Jim fell into his possession.

Bill Ellis suspected that Susan had been the means of entrapping them. He gave her glances full of hateful meaning when she chanced to lock at him, which betrayed what it was in his heart to do, should be ever gain the opportunity.

After breakfast, the prisoners, bound together with ropes, so as to prevent sublence capales, and eccorted by nearly the while county, were marched off to the nearly twenty miles, where we may leave them with the remark that they were afterward third and empired of various crimes, and sont to the policentary, where the most of them worked out their policies. A general fedling of joy pervaled all that part of the State, to think so many of the rascals who stole their Projecty and the left county with counterf it coin, had at length met their deserts.

Great was the admiration testified by the rough settlers for the courage of the landlord's pretty daughter, who had performed so prominent a part in this important arrest. Her daring adventure gave her favor with them, and the Black Bear rose into notice.

Doby took to realing, in her space moments, the "Myster's of Udolpho" and "The Three Spaniards," which cheeved to be among some of the property left by the prisoners,—and, up a this nutriment, she grew dreamy and imaginative, daily expecting some hero to rise before her, and claim her for his own, from among the deperators with which a new state is usually tormented. Of coarse, she also dreamed that the desperato, under her magic independent would be transformed into a good, orthodox, Christian man.

FOR THE MILLION:

BEADLE'S DIME BOOK OF FUN, No. 1. BEADLE'S DIME BOOK OF FUN, NO.

SELECT OF BUILDING

OF REAL PROPERTY AND ADDRESS OF TAXABLE PARTY.

THE RESERVE OF THE PARTY OF THE PARTY.

to produce a series of

. ublishers of "Brade. ooks" have long had it in centers-in the fi rangements have now linto effect, in the most be supplied NAME AND ADDRESS OF TAXABLE PARTY OF TAXABLE PARTY.

Prince Presente Desert Diesert Real Property lies with the last terms of terms of the last terms of terms of terms

THE STUDIOS ASSESS OF A DISTRIBUTE A LABOR TO ELLER LA

"P: THE CAVE CHILL.

CHAPTER XII.

'SIAH WHITE'S ERRAND.

"I Don't believe Susan will live through the winter brother."

"I don't believe she will, Debby,—she's clear heart-tritual I'd give the hull world if I could ondo what I've done at at separatin' her and him. They loved each other, no raist he. I'd no right to let my own angry feelings step in between tent. I used to feel so ugly toward him, every time my arm of we me a twitch,—I just sot up to be as contrary as I could. Now he's dead and gone, I see things in a different light. If I'd have been as generous-minded as he was, there never would have been any trouble. But I wouldn't straighten must is when I could."

"He was altogether the likeliest man I ever saw," sail Debby, with a deep sigh. "I dursn't say so once, in your presence, brother."

"I know it. I'm free to say I did wrong. But that wen't mend matters now. My only child is a dying by incl. shows fore my eyes. Sometimes she looks to me like her meth r's ghost,—my dead wife seems to rise up out of her grave to represent me for my treatment of her child."

"Don't, brother, don't say so."

"It's true. And sometimes I see young Garlin is thest. Of course, I had no hand in murderin' him; but II me and others healn't set them villains on, he would never have met with that untimely only. I've heard Sasin's y he had a mother and sisters on Past. How they must be looking, and wondering, and fearing! I tell you, Debly, I'm a mis rable man."

"It's a miserable house," groanchele; "yes, so down at and quiet, and Sue moving about like a white shall r, never saying any thing only when she's spile to. I can't bear up under it much lenzer, myself. She's always been a self-willed, obstinate girl, and kept me in het water when she was a young-one; but I'd put up with the worst trick she ever p! yel on me, to see her laugh once more. She used to be tall of her pranks. Good gracious! how her eyes do look lately—just like a sleep-walker's!"

"Sometimes I'm thinkin' she'll kill herself," said Mr. Carter, in a low voice.

"She's got too good principle for that, brother."

"I'll tell you what I've been thinkin' of,-moving back to where we came from, in the spring."

"What on 'arth would you do for a livin' when we got back? We're settled here now, and making a little somethin' with prospects of more when people get thicker. It'll take every cent we've got to carry us back, and then what will we do?"

"Id n't know,—and I don't know as I care. I've nothin' to work for, 'less Susan is going to live, and there's only one chance of savin' her,—and that is, gettin' her mind off her treal! s by getting her to stir round, and shakin' her up a little."

"Wall, I suppose I'll have to do as you say. I've followed you round the world pretty faithful so far, Enos Carter. I've brought up your girl for you,—done by her as I would by one of my own, if I'd ever accepted my offers, and had children,—and now I'm willin' to do till the last."

"You've been a good siter, Debby, no one denies that;"

and he sighed wearily.

a will creature. She'll get lost some of these days, or carried off by bears. The neighbors have been telling me it's no strong thing to meet a bear hereabouts. They'll be around after the acorns, since the frost. When the pigs squealed so her his it, I was certain it was—these me! who's that stopping at the late? It's 'Slah White, as sure as my name is Dorah Cater! Well sail! if he hasn't tracked us clear here. He's after Sac, I'll by a basket of chips!"

"I'm right girl to see somebody from the old place," and

Mr. Carter went to the door to greet and welcome him.

"How do ye all do?" askel Jesich, shaking hands with "What brought you to this part of the world?" asked his host, taking his valise and overcoat.

there warn't much to do to home just now. Harves's over, and wheat threshed and corn cut. They had two or three huskin' bees before I left. But, semehow, I couldn't help feling lonesome to all of 'em; so I just made up my mind to start."

"How did you find us?"

"Wall, by inquirin' along. I did have some trouble about it; but I stuck to the track, and here I am! Ghal to see you lookin' so well, Miss Debby. How's Su an?"—as if he had just thought of her.

"She's pocrly very poorly, Sich. Her troubles weigh on her," answered Debby, while Mr. Carter sighed.

'Sigh wanted to inquire what those troubles were, but he could not summon courage, just at that precent time. His eyes were wandering about the room and out of the deer, expectantly.

"We were just talking, sister and me, about taking her back—we thought the change would do her good—revive her up."

"Maybe she'll make up her mind to go back with me,"—and the youth smiled awkwardly, rubbing his han is.

"I wish to goodness she woull," said Delby, "but she won't."

"Is that her?"

Josiah stood mutely, surprised and shocked at the change in her appearance. Pale and thin as a phantom, she glided in from the woods. She was beautiful still, but her beauty was of an unearthly character, which fills I her lover with aways well as adoration.

A slight flush mantied her lily checks when she saw the new-comer. It was called there by the reasonbrance of the part he had once played by the pend on that wintery night. Every thing in her mind was tint d by the no limit of her love for Harry Gardiner. She gave poor 'Slah her head, but without the shalow of a smile, asking after his health without any interest in his reply. Prospects were dark for the yearth, if he came there hoping to win that broken-hearted girl for a brilla.

"It won't do you one speck of good to ask her," Debby assured him, as they stood alone together by the wood-pile, after supper.

"What's come over her?" asked Josiah. "Is she love-sick yet for that young landowner? He gave her the mitten, didn't he !"

"Didn't you know he married her?"

"Married, no! thunder and blazes! what did he leave her for, then?"

Debby sat down on a soft stick of the weed-pile, and told him the stary of the marriage, and all the subsequent events.

"So she really believes he's dead?" asked her listener, when she had finished.

"Of course,—what else is there to think? they left him dead in the wilderness, where, if he'd a come to, he'd a starvel. If he'd been alive, nothing on 'arth would have kept him from gettin' word to his wife, before this time."

"I've reason to think he's still in the land of the livin'."

"What reason, 'Sich White, for mercy's sake?"

"I'd tell her, if I warn't afraid the news would be too sulden. I've got a letter here the Widow Sturgiss gave me to give to her,—she made me promise certain sure to give it to her if I could find her."

"Do you know what's in it?"

my belief it came from Mr. Gardiner to the widow, for Susan. He digit know sheld I to the place, you see. And, to let the cut out of the bar, I just came all the way here to bring that I tter. It it as if I'd had a hand in injuring them as he in't hant me, and I wanted to make amends. I thought so much of Susan, I couldn't hear to think she was miserable, and I thought likely the letter had good news for her,—so I told the willow I'd try and find her, and deliver it with my own hands into hers."

"Ela, Sich, I diln't know you could be so good-natured.

'Spaint, and you've given up all idea of Sisin, you and me Lie to be as a Lain't so easy much older than you,—I could take produce of you in haddhand sickness,—and it's a pity you should come such a long journey for nothing."

She laid her hand on his arm, and smile I bewitchingly.

"No you don't, old girl," he replied, "I can do better. To tell the hull truth, me and Kisty Giles are going to be married fore Christmas. She's the next prettiest girl to Susan in the place. We like each other like buckwheat-cakes and butter. But I couldn't first rest easy in my mind, till I'd done what I could for Susan. But I'll tell you who I guess you could get, if you was on the ground to pop the question in time. Kitty's mother died since you came away, and when Kitty marries, old Giles will have to have someboly to help him carry on the tavern. You'd sait each other first rate."

"I shouldn't wonder if we would," answered Debby, re-

This prespect, vague as it was, seemed to soothe the wound caused by her recent rejection; her spirits rese to unaccustomed gayety.

"Let's go in and break the news of the letter gently, for she's weak and nervous," she said; "maybe we'll all go back together."

Susan was sitting by the kitchen window, her eyes fixed upon the last lingering crimson of subset.

"'Siah's brought you a present,—rus what it is?" began

"I am sure I can not guess. I do not need any thing," she replied, dreamily. "You'd better keep it yourself, aunt."

"If you knew what it was, you wouldn't say so," said Josiah.

"I presume it's very nice,"—in a weary, spiritless way.

"It didn't cost very much," said Jodian, "there's only ten cents postage on it."

She looked quickly up, and saw something in the faces before her which made the blood rush to her face.

"A letter for me? who sent it?"

"Oh! it came from a woman,—in course it ain't all veletter," said the youth warlly, alarmed by the intended her look.

"Who would be writing to me," and she looked dull again.
"Is it from one of the girls—from Kitty Giles?"

"Now, Susan," broke in Debby, "if you'll behave your. If, and not get in need of the camfire, I'll tell you it's from the Widow Sturgiss. Maybe there's news in it."

"Give it to me!" cried Susan, rising to her feet, quivering from herd to foot, her face like a white star, bright and pale.

"Now don't be foolish, Sue," laughed Josiah, placing the letter in her hand, which he had come so far to bring.

"Seems to me it's a man's writing,-may be you know it."

When she saw the superscription, she tried to tear the letter open, but her head began to swim—the room was dark, the familiar faces fled from her, and she fell to the floor in a swoon.

"That was just what I was afraid of;" and Debby ran for the camphor bottle, while Josiah made a fan of his hat.

"There, I am better now. Raise me up. Aunt Delby-oh, Aunt Debby, light a candle, won't you, quick!"

"It'll be two years 'f re I'm married," said the spinster, laughing, as she blew hard upon the coad she held grasped in the tougs, to light the candle with, twice before it lighted.

"I hope not," answere I Josiah. "All signs fail in a dry time. I may have the pleasure of callin' you mother, yet."

"Pshaw, 'Siah! here, Susan, open your letter."

Sha ling her face from observation, the girl tore open the missive and read:

WY DARLING, MY OWN SHEET WILE:-I am safe, I am well, almost. If I were quite well, I should by to you, instead of radius you this. I can not leave my room just yet -- per-L. I shall be able to before long. But every day is an age, -: al I think it best for you to come to m. I was wavlail, teken by surprise, garged, carried off insensible, and thrown away for dead, in this wretched spot, twenty miles from you. How strange you must think it! What anguish you must have endured-greater even than mine! -for you have all the mi rry of suspense, while I know that you are probably safe at home. I can not write you all the particulars now, of my illness and recovery; I am too weak, yet. I can tell you all Bien you fly to me, which you will certainly find some means of doing. Can't you hire Giles to bring you in his buggy ?-I will pay Lim well. Take the Peniry road, drive along cigliteen miles to Jackson's cross-road, strike into the little south road there, continue on two miles—it is only a kind of brille path,—you may have to walk. You will come to a house, with a well-sweep in front of it—the only one anywhere near. Ask there for me. And now, farewell, my dearest, my wife, until you fly to my arms. We will overcome all these difficulties some time. My patience has been sorely tried. This will be mailed at the Cross-Roads, and reach you in two days; perhaps in two more you will be here. My own, my sweet wife, farewell.

HARRY GARDINER.

April 30th.

She looked at the envelope again. It had been sent on to Washington and returned, there being money in it for Susan's use. In those days of slow coaches and no railroads, it took time for a letter to travel from Michigan to Washington, and back again. Mrs. Sturgiss had only received it about a month before Josiah left with it; he had been talking with her about Susan and the Carters, and regretting the scandalous way in which the community had treated young Gardiner, when she had told him of Susan's marriage at her house, of the bridegroom's strange non-appearance, and of the letter she now had.

Moved by remorse, and by a generous impulse new to him, 'Siah had redeemed his character by this attempt to find the one to whom it belonged. For a few moments a dizzling, blinding, bewildering joy dazed Susan's senses; then, doubt and suspense again asserted their sway. Why had he not made his appearance in all these five long months since the letter was written? Maybe he had grown worse again—had died alone, wondering why she did not answer his appeal and fly to him. Oh, cruel blander of the soulless mail! as if they had not trouble enough, without this, to fill the cup.

"We must get ready, father," she said, "to-morrow—to-night, to go back, and find this place he has directed us to. If he is dead, we will know it then—this suspense will be over."

"Let's all pack up and go back," said Debby, her thoughts upon Giles' tavern.

"Wad, ward; time enough in the morning, girls," said Mr. Carter. "Hope for the best, Sasie, and try to pick up strength enough to bear the journey."

"And now, Josiah," said Susan, with a faint smile, placing her hand in his, "whether Hurry and I ever meet again on this earth, or not, I forgive you for all you did to us in the past, and thank you for bringing me this letter."

"Kitty and me are going to get married," blubbered the youth. "She sends her love, and wants you to come to the weddin"."

"I shall be glad to see you and Kitty married," replied Susan; "she is both good and pretty, and a nice housekeeper. Once, I would not have given you credit for being worthy of her; but I have changed my mind;" and she smiled so be uttifully, that 'Slah liked to "have gone off the handle,"—as he expressed it to Kitty afterward.

Mr. Curter thought it best not to start until he had gone over to the little settlement, and found some one who wanted to take the tayern off his hands, and pay him what the furniture and gool-will were worth. He found a man ready to close a bargain; for tayern-keeping is a favorite business with a certain class of men, who are always shifting from one community to another, and who like to take life easy.

"We shall return in less time them we came, with this fine and all of draw us," said Mr. Curter, upon the morning of the second day, as he cracked his whip, and the little old creaky war a rolled on once more, loaded with the family, and such said stock of goods as was endeared to them in their old life. Josiah rolle beside them, looking very well contented with himself and the world.

CHAPTER XIII .-

A NIGHT OF ADVENTURES.

The journey was nearly accomplished. One day more of as good speed as they had been making would bring the party of travelers into their own neighborhood. It was a fine, bright autumn evening, and they concluded it would be more comfortable to camp out, as they had done several times before, than to attempt to find one of the dirty little inus farther on.

Stopping by a tiny brook which ran sparkling across the road, and under the shelter of a great oak-tree, part of whose yellow leaves carpeted the turf below, they tied the horestoosely, so that they might crop the grass, and proceeded to make themselves as comfortable as circumstances would allow. Josiah brought dry sticks and pieces of half-beayed wood, and soon kindled a cheerful fire, over which the old tine. For put was placed, giving forth an ambrosial olor to the honery three, whose appetites were sharpened by a long day's ride.

We say the hungry three, for, although there was a forth one, Susan never knew whether she was hungry or not. Her whole being was so absorbed in the one great mingling of hope and fear, that she simply endured the present. While the supper was being prepared, she went down by the trickling water, and sat by the bank, dropping leaves into it, and watching them as they drifted and eddied away. To-night sie felt uneasy. A sense of danger depress I her, she har he knew why. The day before, they had been passed on the way by three or four men on hor. back, the usual mode of traveling in those days, who looked back after them with a rationing glances. She had discovered, to her alarm, that two et these persons were Bill Ellis and Jim Cross, so much district that neither her father nor Debby suspected who they were. She had not heard of Bill Ellis' escape from the authorities, I'm presumed his friend had aided him in getting out of the not very secure prison.

Since this unexpected appearance she had felt timid and frightened, almost expecting a band of highwaymen to spring out of every forest and thicket which they passed. She i membered the ugly expression, and his threat of vengeance against herself, of Bill Ellis, when he was dragged away from the Black Bear.

Now as she sat there, dropping the leaves and seeing them whirled away, a shadow seemed to fall upon her. She looked around. Only the brightest and most cheery of pictures met her gaze. Her father watering the horses, Aunt Debby's tall figure between her and the leaping, dancing fire, which lighted up the roadside a long distance, Josiah brolling slices of ham on the sharp end of a stick-a little back, the dark for steam I before her the murmuring rivulet, crimson in some 11. Across the stream there was quite a little bank, where the earth had shelved off, and the wood grew down close to it, only parted by the narrow road. Not swing any visible cause of uneasiness, it grew upon her fancy that there was a panther lurking in the or enches of the trees, which overhung the brook, that his fiery eves were devouring her with expectation, and that suddenly 1. would spring upon her, and she would be lost. She the ight of her father's loaded rifle lying in the wagon, ready at a much, and of the pocket-pistol which Josiah carriel—but sar could not rise to flee from the impending danger—she was weighed upon and paralyzed by fear.

"Come, Sasin," called Josiah, "I've toasted this slice expressly for you. You never seen a nicer bit of pig-meat. It's time for you to quit sentimentalizing, and take to catin';" and life torned round toward the brook, with the ham on his impromptu wooden fork. Susan was not there.

"Susan! Susan! Where's the girl gone to?" callel Mr. Carter.

At that instant they were answered by a piercing shrick from the opposite wood, which made each one turn, with a pale face, and stare at the other.

"It's Indians," shuddered Debby.

"It's a panther," said Josiah; "hear the bushes rustle."

"Father! help!"

Mr. Carter seized his rith, sprang into the brook, and run a short distance, until he could climb the bank, up which he rushed, and had hardly got a firm footing, before he was knocked back into the water, rifle and all.

"Ha! ha!" laughed a voice above him, which he recalled as that of Bill Ellis, "try it again, old fellow. It's bad work, betraying the league to the officers. I guess your pretty daughter will never try it again. We're going to have our revenge now!"

Carter struggled to his feet, and again dashed forward with his useless weapon, followed by Josiah, leaving Debby screeming and alone. This time he was not repulsed, the speaker bounding into the woods, flinging back a sardonic hurrah.

They heard no more cries from Susan, whose mouth was stuffed with a handkerchief, as she was hurried along by three men into the pathless depths of the woods. In the forest it was dark—too dark for the pursuers to make any progress; the twilight of the road was here black night.

"It is uscless to go on in this manner," said Josiah, as he stumbled and fell for the third time. "They not only know the way, but they have lanterns. They are not so afraid of our overtaking them but what they have lighted 'em. I must get torches.

"Get 'em, if you will," cried the father, in agony, "but I can not stop. Be spry, Josiah."

Josiah had obtained part of the fuel for his fire from a deal and fallen pine-tree, from which he had amused himself brooking some knots, before he undertook the culinary task of brolling the ham. He now rushed back for these, lighting the mat the fire, where the coffee smoked unregarded.

"O 'Siah! 'Siah White! don't leave me here all alone!" screamed Debby, as he prepared to start with the blazing torches.

"Let go my coat-ta'l!" cried the young man, sternly.
"Noboly's going to hart you. Jet keep up the fire, and hold the carvin'-knife in yer hand, and stay till we could be it;" and wrenching his garm and from her grasp, he bound do fi.

"Every see all is an age," grasped Mr. Carter, as Jestal overtook him, seizing one of the torches; "O 'Slah! they are out of sight and hearin'."

The way was difficult in the extreme, thick growths or underlaush impeding their steps; and, as the party pursued, were familiar with the forest, having every advantage of knowing their own destination, and the best paths by which to reach it, their chances were small indeed. As time passed, and they gradually lost all trace, wandering on in doubt and despite, the frantic father cursed himself in his agony.

"I brought it all on her. I wouldn't let her have the bravest and lest of men, who loved her to distraction. I took her off among desperadoes and ignorantises—and now, I've got my reward! O God! forgive me, and have mercy on a father's anguish !"

At times he stopped, straining his car to listen for the disaut crashing of underbrush, or for some cry which might direct him aright—and when no token came, going on again with set teeth and eyes which glared like a hunted tiger's.

All the courage there was in Josiah's rough nature was excited by the emergency. Could be have encountered a dozen armed men, and by rushing among them, have fought for S is n's liberty, he would not have hesitated. But alas! there was no opportunity for testing the "fight" which was in him. They wandered on and around, not knowing but that every step took them from instead of toward the hapless girl they would have died to save.

The flickering light of the pine-knots burned out, leaving the first in the depths of the forest. Mr. Carter, giving up all hope, flung himself upon the ground and grouned aloud. Josiah, sad and silent, remained beside him.

"Don't, don't take on so," he pleaded, at last. "We must do suthin'—either go forward, or try and find our way tack to poor Debby."

Again they blun lered on in the darkness.

"I see a light," cried Josiah, presently. "We're comin' out on the road—and this is a farm-house. I remember passin' it, on my way out to your house. They ain't gone to bed yet—let's go thar and try and git help."

"It'll be of no use, Josiah. Them villains have haunts of the ir own, where they're as safe from pursuit as a snail in his Shall."

"You ain't a gein' to give up so? While there's life there's hope. Come, cense, rouse yourself, friend Carter."

He had almost to drag his companion across the read, and up to the door, where he knocked smartly, and was quickly answered by a neat-looking young girl. The opening of the door revealed a cheerful scene: the sitting-room of a same farm-house, wherein the family were assembled at their evening employments. A rag-carpet covered the floor, and the fire in the huge fireplace flashed over the tall corner-clock, the high best bed, the old lady in the warmest seat, knitting stockings, two or three bonny girls, a broad-shouldered father and son, and a contented-looking mother.

There was another inmate, whom Josiah dill not at first perceive—a young man lounging on the settle, looking like a convalescent just brightening up after a long illness.

"We want help," spoke Josiah. "We're peaceable travelers, and stopping to cook our supper on the road, some rascals pounced on us, and carried off a young girl."

At the first sound of his voice, the invalid on the settle had oprung up, and was staring at him. Mr. Carter saw who he was, and pushed into the room.

"Them devils have got my girl!" he said, in a chokel voice.

"Who? when? where have they gone? Answer instantly, and to the point, Mr. Carter. All depends on speel."

"It's Bill Ellis, and others of the same gang as kilnapped you, Mr. Gardiner. They've a spite against Susan for betrayin' 'em, and they've swore to be revenged. It seems they tracked us; just as we were gettin' settled for the night, and Sisan a little way off from us, by the creek, they pounced out of the woods and carried her off. It's more'n two hours since."

"We chased 'em," added Josiah, "but they got clear out of sight and hearin'—we've no idea which way to take, and our lights went out, and-"

"Men, get your rifles! Have courage, Mr. Carter. I know where they have taken your child, and if we can reach them in time, we shall save her. I know a shorter route than the one they will be obliged to take. Come!"

Henry's face was white and his tone stern. The inther's anguish could not exceed that of the young hust and. The father and son took down their rifles, the women running to bring them ammunition, in case they should engage in a regular buttle. There was no time to be lost in wonder, curiosity, or explanation.

The five men, well armed, started forth, Harry leading the vey. Following the road for three miles or more, they turned off into a norrow, irregular lane or by-road, which straggled off along the border of a forest. The stars shone brilliantly, so that they had no difficulty in making their way without the use of lanterns. For two or three miles more they hurried on at as fast a rate as they could maintain.

"Hesh!" whispered Harry, as they came within sight of a faint limmer stealing out of the little square window of a log-lant, a little back from the road. "All now depends upon all new. That cabin is a ren lezvous—the place, farmer, where I, myself, lay so long, as I told you. We way seems the cirl without bloodshed, if we are cautious enough. They are always ready for a surprise—these villains are—and the last noise will alarm them. We will strike into the woods here, and approach the house from behind."

With the utmost caution they made their way into the rear, their rides ready for instant action. The rest of the party remaining concealed behind trees, Harry stole up to the window and look in. An old newspaper had been pasted over the sich to keep out observation, should any one in that wild allstrict ever seek to make any; but a corner of it was torn away, so that it afforded a friendly shelter to Harry, while it enabled him to reconnoiter the inside.

His I loo I boile I with in lignation, as he surveyed the scene; and yet a feeling of relief came over him which was like a respite from death. An old woman was busy cooking supper over the fire, while four men were talking, hughing, singing, and drinking, and amusing themselves hurrying the preparations for the repast. Near the fire, which shone fall in her increase to sat Susan, her bonnet and shawlon, but her dress somewhat torn and disheveled from the manner in which she had been hurried along. Her hands were tied together. Her face was pale and fixed, except that her mute, beseeching eyes followed the old woman, as if from her she might implore that him she did not expect from her captors. While Harry gazed, the supper was set up, and the four men drew benches to the table, and seated themselves.

"Push the young lady nearer to us, where we can have the pleasure of feeding her," said Bill Ellis, with a laugh.

"Come, now, fellows, you behave yourselves," growled Jim Cross, angrily. "I only asked you to help me get hold of her. She's mine, and if any of the rest of you lay a hand on her, I'll shoot you."

"Oh, will you, now?" said Ellis; "but perhaps I shan't give her up so easily. Our rule has been, a fair division of the spoils."

Harry crept back to his company.

"There are four of them, and five of us," he said. "Boys, are you sure your guns are all right?"

Mr. Carter had left his wetted rifle at the farm-house, and taken another.

"They are all right," he answered for the party.

"The whole four are just now seated at the supper-table, unsusplcious of any one in their vicinity. Their weapons stand in a corner of the room. My plan is for us to shoot every black-hearted rascal of them, before he has time to seize his gun and make fight."

The farmer and his son demurred to this.

"Then all I've got to say," answered Harry, "is, that you do not know what day your own children may fall into their hands. They're the scourge of the State—have been guilty of almost every crime, and have forfeited their lives to the law long ago. It would be wrong in us to spare them. What! shall I endanger a useful life like one of yours, by pitting it in an equal fight against these criminals? I say, no! My plan is to shoot them down like dogs. There are two doors to the cabin—one in front, just opposite this. Let us divide our force, and open each door at the same instant, and fire upon them before they can spring. Only, don't shoot the girl!"

"No danger of any of us making that mistake," replied the farmer. "We're old hunters, me and my boy, and we know game when we see it."

Carter, Josiah, and the farmer's son went round to the front, Harry and the old farmer crept up to the rear.

During the moment of waiting and silence which ensuel, they heard rude laughter from the quartette of revelers, who were enjoying their supper, unconscious of the danger which lingered so terribly near. Suddenly, both doors were burst open, and a bullet went straight through the hearts of two of the men, before they could rise from their chairs. Jim Cross was bending over toward Susan in such a position that the men were afraid to shoot; with one bound he sprang to the door, where a hand-to-hand scuffle ensued between him and the two persons stationed there, from whom he managed to escape, and bounded into the shadow of the woods, minus his weapons.

The other of the four desperadoes was but slightly wounded; and as he cried "quarter" most pitifully, the rescuers thought best to take him in charge, and hand him over to the proper authorities. The old woman was also arrested and bound as an accomplice.

In the mean time, where was Susan? As, once upon a time, she had cut the thongs which bound him, so now Harry liberated those slender wrists, and when the others had time to lock and think, they found the young couple oblivious of all the world save each other.

If ever a young woman was justifiable in having the hysteries, it was the long-lost wife upon this occasion—and that she laughed and cried in a most uncontrollable way, was forgiven her by all the witnesses. As soon as the two came to their senses, so as to recognize the claims of others, Mr. Carter a lyanced and held out his hand to Harry.

"You have found her," he said; "and never shall you be parted by word or deed of mine. I ask your pardon for the past; and if my good-will and blessin' are worth any thing to you, you have 'em, and welcome!"

Susie looked up into her father's face, clasping her husband's hand, with a look of peace and happiness which blotted out many weary days an I many unkind deeds.

"And here's Josiah," continued Mr. Carter; "if you knew the grand that brought him out after us, you'd bury the hatchet between you, and shake hands on the spot."

"Yes, Harry," said Susan, "he came a tiresome ten days' journey to bring me that long-lost letter of yours, which you sent to me last spring. Forgive all things, and let us all be friends."

"I'm goin' to marry Kitty Giles, so I'm reconciled now, you know," smirke I Jesiah; "but I couldn't have no peace of mind to get married and be enjoyin' myself, till I'd un lone as much of the mischief 'twixt you two as I could, swin' I'd such a hand in separatin' you. The widow Sturgiss was a fettin' awful about that letter, so I jest told Kitty she'd got to wait, for I was goin' to find Sasan Carter if she was to be found this side the Rocky Mountains. We was on our way back when we got into this all-fired scrape—which has jest turned out to be a lucky thing, seein' it's not only run you out of your hele, but has find the country of them dreadful ruscals."

"Let's get the child away from these sickening sights," said Mr. Carter, shuddering at the two dead men, whose retribute n had overtaken them so suddenly and awfully.

"Yes, let us go," whispered Susan.

That night at the farm-house was one long remembered by its inmates. The man and woman under arrest were tightly bound, and confined in an out-house during the night. It was not until the party were gathered once more around the cheerful fire that anybody thought of poor Debby, so exciting had been their adventure and its results. Sus in was the first who mentioned her.

"La! poor soul, she'll be scart nigh to death," said Jasiah. "Jest the rest of you stay here, and make yourselves comfortable, while I go back and get her. I'll bring the whole kit along, and we'll jest make a night of it at your house, farmer, if you say so."

"Of course I say so. My gals will have supper really for the hull lot, against you get back. It's only a matter of two miles from here to the creek, by the road."

"I'd better go along, in case of another ambuch," said Harry, and the two went back along the roud for the deserted spinster.

They found her curled up as far back in the covered waron as she could get, the curving-knife held in front of her, and so thin held by terror that she refused to recognize them, after they had made themselves known.

"Go 'long!" she cried; "ain't it enough you've seized and carried off Susan, without comin' back for me?"

"No, it ain't enough at all. We want you," laughed Jesah, supposing she would see who it was.

"You shan't have me! never! never! go 'long!"

Sig floarished the big knife furiously.

waiting," said Harry.

"Don't try to coax me. S'pose I'm goin' to be ceaxed off to be murbered in coll blood. Go leng, I say."

"Why, Debby, den't you know me? you don't think your ow: nephow, Harry Gardiner, would kidnap you, do you?"

"Is that you, Harry?" she asked, doubtfully—and then as the sail s of fright fell from her eyes and ears, and she saw and heard correctly, the threatening knife dropped in her lap, and she just sat still and looked at them in mute contentment. They hitched the horse to the wagon, Josiah mounted his stell, and Harry had actually lifted Aunt Debby out, and placed her in the milst of the circle around the farm-house fire, before she came to herself enough to ask questions.

The lest that could be got up on short notice was placed on the hospitable board, and exciting talk and explanations ker: the whole party sleepless until the morning broke.

CHAPTER XIV.

A DOUBLE WEDDING.

It was the evening of Kitty Giles' marriage. Now indeed the old tavern glowed with a brilliancy which far outrivaled even the splender of the leading ball the previous year. In every fireplace the hickory logs glowed and flushed; garlands hung from the dining-room, the sitting-room, the kitchen, and the ball-room. Even in one year the settlement had advanced in the luxuries of civilization; real sperm candles glimmered in every available nook; and the minee-pies were not made from dried apples.

The wedding was going to be a very public affair. Kitty had wished to be married quietly, since her mother had been dead but half a year; but her father would not hear to his only daughter's going away from home in any such style. It was the fashion of the times. A wed ling without a wedding-feast, with wine, and dancing, and rejoicing, was a mean and ill-omened wedding. There must be the festivities at home; and the second evening, either the bride-maid or some intimate friend gave the "infairs"—on this occasion it was to be at the house of the bridegroom's father. Jerusha White was to be bride-maid, and Jonathan Giles, Kitty's brother, was to be groom-man.

The neighbors had all taken hold and helped Kitty in her preparations. "Miss" Peters had made the pies—pumpkin, cranberry, and mince; Jerusha, Kitty, and half-a-dozen other girls had made the "oceans" of cake. Mr. Giles had sent to Pontiac for raisins and citron, currants and spices, and a box of wine. Everybody was invited, and everybody was excited at the fabulous tales which went abroad, of the astonishing profusion of fruit-cake, and almonds, and motto-candies there was to be; mothers kept their children in unwonted subservience by the promise of these dainties "after the weddin'," if they "were good." For enough must be provided, not only for the company to feast upon, but for each guest to carry away a landkerchief or pocketful. Every youth and maiden must have a piece of the wedding-cake to put under their pillows and dream upon three nights "hand-running," that they might find out who they were going to marry. And it would be almost a disgrace to the bride, if she did not have some of the veritable bridal-loaf on hand, every time a friend dropped in, for a year after the event.

Kitty shed a good many tears to think her dear mother had no visible part in all this rejoicing, though she firmly believed she rejoiced with her in spirit; but she could not help being happy and excited—the pretty, central light, around which all this brilliancy revolved.

Debby Carter, kind, unselfish, motherly body that she was (!), just come over and staid the last week, taking the charge of things generally. Mr. Giles had not decided what to do after Kitty left. He had some thoughts of renting the tavern-stand, and retiring to private life. He had secured a tolerably good "Lelp" to do the rough work, but things did not go on so smoothly as they had under Mrs. Giles' notable administration.

But, to come back to the all-important evening. The gayest ill amin tion that sperm could give, flashed the house from cellar to garret. Young people, after off, just putting on the last of their finery, heard the premonitory squeak of fiddles, which were drawn forth in the bar-room by the arriving musicians, and the tantalizing sounds caused their fingers to tremble in tying their cravats and so less. At seven o'clock, everybody invited was gathered in the leng sitting-room, the hall, the bedroma aljoining, and even crowdel into the bar-room for the time ! sing. Not one-half of them could hope to see the bride at I bribgroom at the moment of the ceremony. All were so eager to do this, that the father finally yielded to the sugzeti nof the young folks, to have the ceremony take place in the ball room, where all would have a tolerable chance. So, to the ball-room the guests went. At ten minutes Fest seven, the minister, Mr. and Mrs. White, and Mr. Giles, entered, and took seats at the top of the room. A buzz and stir greeted their appearance, which heralded the approach of the still more important personages.

At fifteen minutes past seven, in walke I Jerusha White upon the arm of Jonathan Giles, followed by Joriah and Kitt, amidst the breathless hush of the assembly, proceeding to the top of the apartment, where the bride-maid and growning parted, and the couple to be married took their places between them, facing the good old minister, who rose and advanced to them.

How bashful, and yet blessed was the countenance of the groom. And how Kitty did change color—pale and red, pale and red, and yet, looking her prettiest all the time! Before the minister began the ceremony, there was a moment improved by the female guests in scrutiny of the bride's dress. It was actually white silk,-Kitty had sent her measure away to Pontiac, and hal it bought and made up there. Around her trim little figu e floated a soft vail of illusion luce, which fell from a wreath c white burls crowning her black hair. Her slipp as were of white satin, and both she and Jerusha were white kid gloves, which came half-way up between the wrist and elbow, and were trimmed with thread-lace. Jerusha's dress was made from the best piece of book-muslin in Peters' store, and had Tink ribbon run in the tucks. Both the bridegroom and his ; I wore white silk gloves, and had white silk handkerchiefs I. in ging out of their coat-tail pockets.

But the minister commenced speaking, and all eyes turned to the two crimson faces. Kitty's black eyes were vailed by the ir long lashes, but Josiah looked the parson manfully in the eye, and responded, "I will," in a loud, strange voice, which the girl by his side would not have recognized at any other time, and in direct contrast to her faintly-whispered token of assent.

"I pronounce you man and wife," couclu led the minister; and immediately claimed the privilege of being the first to kiss the bride.

"Oh, my! how I feel," whispered Debby, clinging to the father's arm; "jest as much agitated as if it were a daughter of my own. I've always taken an uncommon interest in Kitty."

"There ain't many girls her equal," responded the proud parent. "I don't know how I'll get along, now that sie's going away."

"She's waitin' for me to shake hands with her," said Mr. Giles, wiping his eyes, and, grasping his daughter's hand, he hised her bodly, while she smiled and cried.

"D n't cry, now, Kitty; there's lots of kissing to be dene," sil J. Jah. So everybody in the room kissed the newlymarried pair.

While this part of the proceedings was taking place, Dabby r gained her place by the wislower's side.

sympathizing tone; "I've thought of you so often this past week. I see lots and lots of things going wrong. That help of yours don't take no interest, Mr. Giles. The bottom's borned eat of the brass preserving-kettle Mrs. Giles was so our ful of, and there was a pitcher broke, and thrown out behind the wood-pile yesterday."

"I don't see what I'm to do."

"Every thing's going to wrack and ruin as fast as it can. In the lable-cloths—some of 'em wanted darnin'; and that caller, you ought to see the state it's in."

"I've been thinkin' I'd have to sell out, or rent."

"It would be a great pity for you to do that, Mr. Gles, when you've got such a splendid run of custom, and every time flouishin', making money hand over hand. Why don't you got some good, industrious we man, to take charge of the house for you?"

"How could I get one, Miss Curter? Who could I get?"

Why, nerry someboly, of course. It needs a wite to take an interest. There won't noboly else, you may depend."

Mr. Glies scratched his head, and looked sidewise at the suggestive spinster. She was famous for her cooking, Dobby was, and she had made herself extremely useful the past week. No dealst she was just the person. He took a second glance. Doby was looking unusually well; she had had a dove colored This t-cloth made on purpose, and a black-lace head-dress which she were, concealed the scantiness of her black hair, while the ringlets in front were as glossy as goose-oil could make them.

"It's rather soon for me to be takin' another wife, Miss Carter."

"Everybody knows how bad you need one, with Kitty leaving you, and this great tavern on your hands. Besides," she whispered, "it don't cost any more to have two weddings at the same time, than it does one."

"That's a fact. You're a sensible woman, Miss Debby. If you're a mind, just say so, and we'll stand right up."

"Oh, dear me! I was not a thinking of myself-I-I-"

"Say yes or no, Debby."

"Wall-yes, then, if you will hurry me so; but I never thought-"

" No matter. Here, parson, here's another couple requires your services."

The company, which was beginning to scatter, paused, clate and curious. Debby blushed a little, but bore their surprise like a heroine, as the widower took her hand, and the minister accomplished the object of her life, by making her a wife.

"I feel relieved, father,-you will not be so lonely," said the younger bride, as she kissed him after the ceremony.

"Good for you, mother Debby,-I knew you'd bring it about," whispered Josiah, as he squeezed her hand.

"Go along," said the mother-in-law, slapping his check.

"My friends," spoke up the pastor, just after this little chisode, "before the old folks go down stairs, leaving the young ones to dance, there's a person wishes to make a little speech to you."

Another surprise? once more the company was all curiosity. The same door which had given entrance to the briddlarty now unclosed, and a young couple, not recently seen in their midst, entered,—Susan and Harry.

" Mr. and Mrs. Gardiner,"-announced the paster.

It was the first time any public announcement of their marriage had taken place; there was a murmur and stare of surprise. There was danger that the interest legitimately belonging to the original bride and groom, would be usurped by so many, all wearing the bridal honors.

Sus in wore the white dress in which she had been married. The roses of love and hope were opening again on her checks. Not so bright, not so sparkling as merry, black-eyed Kitty White, she possessed an ethereal beauty which was all her own. She stood by Horry's side, her soul in her eyes, watching him while he spoke. His countenance bore traces of recent illness; but his proud, athletic form showed an innate sir noth, e.p. He of resisting the ravages of more than one such sickness.

"Having been asked by our friends to be present on this I pry occasion," he began, "we wished to accept the invitation, howing that we leave the community without any ill-ling toward it. We have been made to suffer, much and litterly, and without provocation. We were obliged to meet by scoleb, to marry in secret, and were torn apart, for long to this of suspense and suffering, by the same spirit of persection. These troubles are over. Some of those most active to first me, have signified their sense of the injustice they did to the forgiven. Mr. Carter has given me his longht r, with the assurance that he is glad she is my with. Josith White, the happy bridegroom, once bound to the impieces, is now one of the best of friends.

"What I desire to make known is this :—every farmer who is its any land of mine is welcome to it. I am going to retain to the East, and shall make no farther claim upon any it. I am well paid for all trouble, time, expense, and persection in this forem, which I have become heir to," and he turned to Susan, kissing her hand.

A marriage of applicase and delight ran through the assembly. The years couple were so hardsome, so noble,—and Mr. Garlle, r had behaved with such spirit, such generosity! The tide had turned.

The fill's, flute, and chrimet begin to tune up; and the ministr and cherly people be it a hasty retreat to the sound, then I be they should actually be caught in a ball-room, and pullips keeping time with their feet. The widower and his brile went with him, and below there was talking, card-light, and a little repressed festivity; while above, the two briles and their grooms led off the dance, music beating in their pulses and thriffing in their hearts.

"It's curless how every thing has come out to everyboly's which is an arrived D blog to Mrs. Peters, as they sat tothe read a corner of the settee, in the best room, with their meglibers busy talking and making themselves comfortable.

"Well, yes, it is, rad'er," said that lady drily.

It takes women to see through one another's "arts and whes," and they den't like to see each other speeced, cither; and now Mrs. Peters, though a married woman and the mother of seven children, having no personal interest whatever in the matter, was almost vexed at the swift victory gained by the cunning spinster, with whom she had been engaged for the last week in performing the neighborly work of making the pie and cake for the great occasion.

"Den't you believe the tarkeys are really to cerae up?" she asked.

"La, yes. I left Mary mashing the pointoes half an hour ago. But I'm so confused to-night, I forget every thing. You see I didn't expect to be married for a month yet."

"Oh, dich't you? You must be rather flustrated. Come, then; Miss Brown, and Miss Sturgiss, and Miss White are going to help us dish up the things."

Shortly after, the welcome summons to supper was obeyed by the guests. Mr. and Mrs. Giles sat at the head, Susan and Harry to the right, Kitty and Josiah to the left, the minister next on the left, Mr. Carter next on the right, and the other guests in a long row down the extensive dining-room. There were also two side tables, equally well filled,—and when we report that not only did the company do ample justice to every course of the catables, from the roast turkey to the seft-shelled almonds, but that each one left the table with a paper or a handkerchief well stuffed with the choicest bits, it will be an that to supply the feast for such a wedding was no small undertaking.

That hour at the head of the brilliantly-lighted this was the most triumphant of Debby's life. She was a muridly woman, and she was the landfuly of Giles' tayern. Nothing more was wanting to her heart or to her ambition, only see could afferd to smile benignly upon the young couple of lexinght.

After supper, the soluter of the guests with frew. The were still a few couples of young people keeping up the decay avowing their purpose of whiting till the bridd parties half the had then project them the accustomed visit. But Hary was a spirited lassic, and she proposed to weary them cat.

"Come, Harry," she said, drawing him and Susan into a Git to rie of the deserted front-room, "come, Josiah, It's Love at die,—It's hold a grand Indian pow-wow, all by our-side. Josiah has not told me one word about your alventure yet." Swan stole her hand into Harry's, and he began his narrative:—

I was driving centionsly along the road beyond the widow fried, leaking through the twillight for the glimmer of Since it is, I got out of my burgy, and led my horse, for the two red branches hanging low, and logs scattered here and the Salindy I was seized and garged. I thought of my will, and resisted like a med tigress when her cubs are in dug z. I have such a to I work of it, that one of the robhas it that a line to five a liftern a moldering tree and knock-1 lates .. b.. What happened after that I do not know, that the merning broke over me, and I aroused myself from a ' stip r, with a sickening weight in my limbs, and a terilled about me. I was in a Fr -t, but it did not seem to me the same. I had down to dia, and remain it some time, thinking I should die. But the the character Seen recent me again, and I crept on, I knew 1 1 Where, whetherd per into er out of the woods. Coming in a limit to be the falling through the moss, I wet my head and 'i. . . . lag thirt; gaining courage to stagger on for per-" .s un l. c, wh a I came out upon a by-road, near a log-I rail the house, and knocked; but when a with and the door, I fell forward insensible, hi was taving fir the next ten days.

When I did come to my senses, I was so reduced I could be lip while. It was two weeks before I could wield a least the woman who narsed me, could not write. I had from her that I was twenty miles or more from the limit. Size had a single sheet of paper, and an old pend in had had he had by her husband, and she squeezed out in head he from some terries for me to write with. I had just have enough in my pocket to pay the postage on the letter, and a stray till which had been overlooked by the robbers. If it the till in the letter, thinking Sue would need it to get in I had a t even my watch or chain,—my trunk, papers, money, and watch were all gone. I told the woman my story, and she was very kind to me. She took my letter to the little house, at the cross-roads, where the mail stepped once a week, taking in the few tributes from the scattered inhabitants.

There was something strange about her living all alone in a hut in the woods. She did not seem to lack for provisions though how she got them, I did not know. She told me her husband was off on the prairies hunting—that he spent his summers so. She had two children; but I did not b lieve they were her own.

When time sufficient had passed for me to expect Susan,my state of suspense and excitement told terribly on my weakened frame. The woman warned me that I would bring back my fever if I did not control myself. My sense of hearing became preternaturally acute. Night and day I listen !, listened for the expected roll of buzzy-wheels. Through the day I sat in the door or by the little dim window, just able to hold myself up, looking, listening, and every night suffering from such an acute sense of disappointment, that, as my nurse foretold, I brought back my fever. For six weeks I never left my bed. Oh, how I longed for some stranger to come idong, and happen into that little house, that I might beg him to write another letter for me. Was Susan sick? was she deal? why did she not come? I asked the women to go to the cross-roads and get a letter written there for me,-but for some reason she refused. She did not seem to wish to meet her few neighbors, and I remembered that when she went before, she chose the evening for the erran l.

I began to regard her as a suspicious character. At let company came to the cabin,—two men, who came in the evening, and only stail over night. There were two rooms to the hat, and, as I laid in the smaller one, I could hear them whispering together nearly all night. The men consin and took at me, and asked me what was the matter with me, and if I should be able to pay my bourd if I get well. I answered that I should reward the woman well for her savices when I got able to return to my friends, but that I had money then, as I had been robbed. They showed some curiosity upon hearing of the robbery, inquiring the place and time;—just then I saw, by the flash of the light in the other 10 m, that one of them was wearing my watch-guard. I know it in an instant. The chain and soul were both too 1 direct me to be mistaken. I asked him where he got the chain, saving it was a curlous pattern, and I'd like to buy 1 If I ware alte. He answered that he had bought it from a final. I did not tell them it was mine, for I was weak, and in their power entirely. I suspected them, now, to be members of a goog, other members of which had been engaged in I did pring my. After they returned to the larger room, I had them stowing away sundry articles in the little loft, which they could reach by standing on a bench, so low was the citing. I concluded that the woman was a confederate and receiver of stolen goods.

As I tell you before, my hearing was preternaturally acute; and I could distinctly understand portions of the conversation can be in the lowest whisper, while they supposed me to be sleeping.

"He must be the same," said one.

"Yes," said the other, "Bill Ellis told me all about it. They therefore they had stopped his chapper effectually. But it seems they didn't. I wonder if he noticed whose chain I had on!"

"He's to used up to notice any thing. I think the old well in the parameter him up. It'll pay. I know all all thin. He's rich and liberal; he treated them follows all liberal; that saved him such a dirty trick. They say he was in lare with Carter's girl,—did you ever see her?—she's dued pretty."

We like the father's a reglar old trump, --and obstinate as a made. He was one of the conspirators. He's moved away from them parts now."

My heart give such a great thump as I heard the latter senterm, it some as if they must hear it.

"Where's he gone?"

"Dat know. Moved off, cause he was mal about this Frankling, -i i, i, iirlol, tog t til of him."

Bill will Jim have get his papers, and are makin' a good thing out of 'em. What do you say, old woman, to givin' him a dose?"

"Wouldn't like to," she grumbled. "The children likes him, and I does myself."

"Oh, well, we won't trouble you. A little blow with this will do the job;" and the villain struck something which he held lightly against the wall.

Despite of my long sickness, I was in no mood to resign life; and silently as a shadow I slipped out of bed, put on my clothes, which hung at the foot, and crept out the little square window, through which I could just squeeze my body. It was the first time I had stood on my feet for some days; I was dizzy and weak; but I crawled back into the wood, and wandered I knew not wither.

Delirium must have come on, and with the fictitions strength which it gave, I ran a great distance, sometimes laughing and shouting, sometimes imagining that I was pursued by purthers or hissed at by rattlesnakes.

By daylight I had come out on a strange road in a more civilized part of the county, as I found afterward, for I knew nothing of it then, sinking insensible to the ground, where I was shortly after picked up by a kind-hearted furner, taken to his house, and skillfully nursed by his wife and daughters for the next month. If my constitution had not been excellent, I never should have rallied.

I think, Sue, (with a light laugh), one of the good farmer's daughters was falling in love with me, I was so interesting a patient,—but I took care to let it be known that I was a murried man. From this place I wrote to my lawyer, who that discovered the forgeries imposed upon him.

I was just thinking of venturing my strength and leaving the farm-house, when that strange chance threw Mr. Carter into my vicinity, and made me instrumental in the reservof my own wife.

"Didn't you reward those kind nurses?" asked Sue. "If it had not been for them, I should never, never have seen you again."

"I have not yet, I declare," cried Harry. "I could think of nothing but my lost wife since she is found. But you shall go to Peters' store to morrow, and pick out three of the handsomest silk dresses he has, and any other tritles you think will delight the girls, and I will send the package by the first wagon which passes that way."

"Oh, let me go along?" said Kitty, "I do so love to buy pretty things !"

"When I reached this place," continued Harry, "the Willow Sturgiss told me of the delay of my letter, and that J did had started, only three days before, to find Susan and deliver it to her."

"This is a bul world, isn't it?" sighed Kitty.

"Now, Kitty, you don't think so to-night, do you?" asked 'Siah.

"It's good and it's bad-but mostly good to me now, since

I am so happy," said Suc.

"Why yes; it's good and it's bad," remarked Harry. "I thought, a while ago, that it was mostly bad; but since those disin's restal farmers took such good care of me, and since Jo-Sich here performed so generous an action, and your father, S -, les blervel so finely,—and since I find what a sweet, What a prinches treasure a wife is, I certainly believe it is mostly good."

"Say, children," said Aunt Debby, coming into the room, "the company's all gone, and everybody is tired. Don't you think it's time to shut up the house?"

CHAPTER XV.

THE SQUATTERS' CANDIDATE.

The infair at Mr. White's the evening after the welling was a joyous affair, second only in feasting and music to the wedding itself. Mrs. Deborah Giles was the queen of the occasion. The ancient bride wore her honors with a grace which was all her own. She snubbed Prudence Burdell, the sole remaining old muid of the neighborhood, looking down upon her out of the heights of her own superior estate, with a pitying dignity.

Among the men of the party, the infair part ok something of the nature of a political meeting. The November election of State officers was about coming off, and in this particular district a man was wanted for the honorable office of representative to the Congress of the United States. Elated with the noble generosity which the young landowner had displayed, the people could now not only acknowledge his liberality about the lands, but could open their eyes to all his other virtues—his graceful speech, his refined manners, his superior classicm.

"He's jest the man!" sail Mr. Giles, emphatically slapping his knee, to give force to his assertion.

"He's jest the man!" echoed Mr. Carter.

"He's jest the man!" criz lone and all—and they immellately made up their minds to run him as an independent candidate, and to work with all their might and main for his election, irrespective of party or party interest.

It was a curious instance of the unreliability of popular opinion—this almost religious enthusiasm of the masses in favor of the young man whom, one little year before, they had threatened with the pond, the tar-barrel, and the rope.

The history of his struggles with the squatters, and of the manner in which he had reconciled his difficulties with them, spread through the adjoining counties. Mr. Carter had nothing to do but ride about in his wagon, and talk people into voting for his somindaw. Harry rose upon the highest wave of popular good-will. His praise was in everybody's mouth.

The inflience of women was not wanting. How powerful that may become in the hands of one of the strong-minded of the sex, was proved by Debby upon this occasion.

She said nothing to any one about her plans, except that her nephew should be elected. For a week before the day of election, she, and those around her, were kept at a high-pressure state of industry, cooking up enough provisions to feast an army. Never before had Giles' tayern held so fabulous an amount of "the best of every thing;" one small room, in the second story, was actually overflowing with pies and crall is al me, pile I up to the ceiling.

On the decisive morning, she put on her dove-colored dress and best bonnet, and role to the court-house, which had ence witnessed the seene of the young man's trial, and before which Were the polls. Here she announced to the assembling crowd, that every man who would assert upon his honor that he had Voted for Harry Gardiner that day, should have a free pass at Gies' tayern to the best dinner the country could afford. This announcement was briled with tremen loss cheering, and she Indiabak again to see to the dinner, feeling that she passessed an invisible thread of influence which would gently but irresixibly drew every voter worth having in her direction. And she was right. The double motive of a good man and a good dian r was too much for the wavering; and the regular candillites, so ing their own hopes burst, like glittering soupbublica into airy nothings, concluded to east their own votes in fiver of their rival, and thus win a part in the grand free I stival which was to be the feature of the day.

Upon the shoulders of the same men who once before, after his trid for marder, harried him off with the most horrible of intentions, Herry was lifted—against his will, certainly, but not so much against it as on that previous occasion—and borne the entire distance from the court-house to the grove in the rear of the tavern, where he was hoisted upon a platform, and compelled to make a speech.

It was a warm, delicious Indian summer day, and tables had been erected with the most impromptu speed in a choice spot of the grove, where they received irregular ornamentation from the gorgeous leaves which dropped upon them, here and there, like brilliant butterflies. A splendid carpet of the same beautiful material by thickly upon the ground.

We venture to assert that not all the jewels and the gaslig. s, the thousands of dollars' worth of decoration, at the last night's ball to His Royal Highnes, Albert Elward, Prince of Wals, gave more of beauty, nor as much of enjoyment, as these simple ornaments which Mother Nature hung around, above and beneath the tables spread for the political feasting of the rough welverines. There was no heat to stiffe, no want of fresh air, there was abundance of room for all-the trees Boured their royal banners, and hung out their golden chandeliers, full only of the sunlight of heaven-the winds played a seft and whispering music, without any envy or jeal resy of rival breezes, -and there was but a single reporter present to view "the occasion," with that satirical, humorous, wie, s lenna, won trous critical gaze, which so often proves this class superior to all mortal attempts to conciliate them. And if we may believe this single reporter's enthalistic account of the afflin, in the next week's issue of the Wolverine Herle, that surprising faculty of viewing every thing through a cr. .:ed quizzing glass, had not yet been attained by him.

The magnificence of money purchases some of the pore to pyments of life; no splen for of preparation, no corte to cook to Delmonico, and dresses ordered from Paris, can be sure of a species superior to crowding, accident, criticism, and disposintment,—but Deboy's Dinner was a triumph which kin s and aristocracy might envy, if real, to topics pleasure be the object of festal gatherings.

Brief speeches and humorous tousts increased, the merriment of the dinersont,—out in the grand old woods, we mean—and Dobby herself, flying about with her handariless, and bearing upon all, as she never could of done in the winter of her unwelled discontent, in the a little speech in fivor of the people's candidate herself, which was received with lond, but not uproarious applause.

The dinner carried the day; and if the allareneats of a feet like that was the temptation which brought over some who week had otherwise have a body to be a large for here, he wise men of greater ambition be silent,—they have beams in their own eyes which should prevent their discovering this mote.

And thus it was that our backwoods' belle went to Washington, and shone among the gairish beauties there, with a pure and simple loveliness no art could imitate. The simple girl who prized so highly her single, and long-preserved silk dress, had beautiful dresses in abundance, and could choose out of a dozen satin, silk, or velvet robes, that which suited her fancy for the time. But Susan was the same at Washington as she had been in her father's cabin,—gentle, pure, unpretending. She had one set of jewels, exquisite pearls, which she had purchased in New York, on their way to the capital, with a sum of money made up by the squatters on the day of the dinner, and presented to her husband for the purchase of a bridal present to his wife.

While his only child was so far from him, moving in a sphere so different, Mr. Carter, a much less growling and dissatisfied man than formerly, boarded at Giles' tavern, and was made comfortable by his sister, as in the days of old. His arm gave him no pain, except a few twinges in damp weather; and as he had no occasion for work, beyond trifling services in assisting Debby in her hurried days, the loss of its youthful strength many than the loss of its yout ful strength was not very seriously felt.

The vacations were spent by the young married couple with Harry's mother, in New York, as journeying West, in those days, was a serious attempt; and it was not until the term of his office had expired, that Susan could offer her father a permanent home with them.

Debby made a glorious landlady; the fame of the tavern spread far and wide. She had no babics of her own, but her feminine instincts showed themselves in the quantities of fine socks she knitted, of winter evenings, for her niece's babies.

The part of Michigan which was the scene of those troubles and excitements, is now thickly settled and prosperous. Harry, having once got into the stream of politics, could not get to shore again, and has been wafted on from honor to honor; he still shines in the brilliant circles of the capitol, and Susan, alternately shining at home and abroad, is a fair, fresh matron, some of whose pretty daughters is sure to carry away her old distinction of being the Backwoods' Belle.

THE RESIDENCE .

Unique and Original Books!

FOR THE

FAMILY, SCHOOL-ROOM EXHIBITION, &C.

THE EXTRAORDINARY SUCCESS OF

BEADLE'S DIME DIALOGUES No. 1,
BEADLE'S DIME SPEAKER No. 1,

Has induced the publishers to prepare, at heavy expense,

Beadle's Dime Dialogues No. 2, BEADLE'S DIME SPEAKER No. 2,

WHICH CONTAIN

MORE THAT IS ORIGINAL AND NEW,

MORE THAT IS GOOD AND ADAPTIVE,

Than any dollar book yet offered to the Youth of the Land, the Fireside, and the School-Room. It is the fault of all books published for the use of boys and girls, that, besides being expensive, they are mostly not adapted for use upon any and all occasions, requiring too much acting, scenery, &c. The publishers of the DIME BOOKS resolved to supply the want of books, at once very cheap, and very good; and the immense sales of the first issues show with what success they have catered to the want.

The new issues now ready embrace very many choice and beautiful Pieces, never before introduced to the public, viz.: extracts from famous Speeches, by the most eminent of living orators, as well as most charming Poems of humor and pathos; while the book of Dialogues is composed entirely of new and most effective Dialogues, minor Dramas, Comediettas, Burlesques, and Recitations; all prepared expressly for this work, by the very best hands. It is, therefore, not assuming too much, to say they are the Best Books even offered to Students and To the Homes of America.

BEADLE AND COMPANY, Publishers, 141 William Street, New York

FOR THE MILLION!

BEADLE'S DIME SCHOOL MELODIST, BEADLE'S DIME LETTER-WRITER, BEADLE'S DIME COOK BOOK, BEADLE'S DIME RECIPE BOOK, BEADLE'S DIME DIALOGUES. BEADLE'S DIME SPEAKER,

BEADLE'S DIME BOOK OF ETIQUETTE, BEADLE'S DIME MELODIST, BEAULE'S DIME BOOK OF DREAMS, BEADLE'S DIME BOOK OF GRICKET. BEADLE'S DIME BASE-BALL PLAYER, BEADLE'S DIME GUIDE TO SWIMMING

Beadle's Dime Song Book, No. 1. Beadle's Dime Song Book, No. 2. Beadle's Dime Song Book, No. 3.

Beadle's Dime Song Book, No. 4. Beadle's Dime Song Book, No. 5, Beadle's Dime Song Book, No. 6.

BEADLE'S DIME SONG BOOK, NO. 7.

BEADLE'S DIME BOOK OF FUN, No. 1. BEADLE'S DIME BOOK OF FUN, NO. 2.

BEAULES DURENU

A DOLLAR BOOK FOR A DIME!

The publishers of "BEADLE'S DIME BOOKS" have long had it in contemplation to produce a series of DIME NOVELS, which should embody in the fiction literature of America and Europe. Arrangements have now been perfected by which the enterprise will be carried into effect, in the most efficient and creditable manner; and the American public will be supplied with THE CHOICEST NOVELS OF THE DAY, at the nominal sum of TEN CENTS EACH.

The Best Works of the Best Authors,

Each volume will contain One Hundred and Twenty-Eight large 12mo pages of letter-press, printed with clear and expressly-prepared type and book-paper, and bound in heavy paper covers of bright salmon color-making a volume of much beauty, and delightful to read. The volumes will be issued semi-monthly, in regular succession.

Dime Novels Now Ready:

NO. 1. - MALAESKA: THE INDIAN WIFE OF THE WHITE HUNTER.

No. 2.—THE PRIVATEER'S CRUISE, AND THE BRIDE OF POMPRET HALL.

No. 3. - MYRA: THE CHILD OF ADOPTION.

NO. 4 -ALICE WILDE: THE RAFTSMAN'S DAUGHTER.

5-THE GOLDEN BELT; OR, THE CARIN'S PLEDGE.

"P: THE CAVE CHILD.

E REEFER OF '76; OR, THE CRUISE OF THE FIRE-FLY. TH JONES; OR, THE CAPTIVES OF THE FRONTIER.